

2-8-2013

The Discursive Construction of Japanese Identity and its Haunting Others

Yoshiko Yamada

Florida International University, yyama002@fiu.edu

DOI: 10.25148/etd.FI13042314

Follow this and additional works at: <http://digitalcommons.fiu.edu/etd>

 Part of the International Relations Commons

Recommended Citation

Yamada, Yoshiko, "The Discursive Construction of Japanese Identity and its Haunting Others" (2013). FIU Electronic Theses and Dissertations. 853.

<http://digitalcommons.fiu.edu/etd/853>

This work is brought to you for free and open access by the University Graduate School at FIU Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in FIU Electronic Theses and Dissertations by an authorized administrator of FIU Digital Commons. For more information, please contact dcc@fiu.edu.

FLORIDA INTERNATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Miami, Florida

THE DISCURSIVE CONSTRUCTION OF JAPANESE IDENTITY AND ITS HAUNTING OTHERS

A dissertation submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of

DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY

in

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

by

Yoshiko Yamada

2013

To: Dean Kenneth G. Furton
College of Arts and Sciences

This dissertation, written by Yoshiko Yamada, and entitled The Discursive Construction of Japanese Identity and Its Haunting Others, having been approved in respect to style and intellectual content, is referred to you for judgment.

We have read this dissertation and recommend that it be approved.

Harry D. Gould

Benjamin Smith

Clair Apodaca

François Debrix, Major Professor

Date of Defense: February 8, 2013

The dissertation of Yoshiko Yamada is approved.

Dean Kenneth G. Furton
College of Arts and Sciences

Dean Lakshmi N. Reddi
University Graduate School

Florida International University, 2013

© Copyright 2013 by Yoshiko Yamada

All rights reserved.

DEDICATION

I dedicate this dissertation to my mentor in life Daisaku Ikeda. He is my inspiration, and the completion of this work would not have been possible without him.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

First and foremost, I wish to express my deepest gratitude to my major professor, Dr. François Debrix, for his mentorship and for helping me develop the theoretical and analytical frameworks for my study. I am indebted to him for his patience and guidance throughout the research process.

The members of my committee, Dr. Harry D. Gould, Dr. Benjamin Smith, and Dr. Clair Apodaca, provided me inspiration and assistance without which this study would not have been successful. I thank each of them for their time, patience, and support. Also, I would like to give my utmost appreciation to Florida International University's Doctoral Evidence Acquisition Fellowship and Dissertation Year Fellowship for financial support during the research and writing phases of my dissertation.

I am thankful to all my friends, especially Miyako Enomoto, Akihisa and Chiaki Tsunekawa, Hideki and Nobue Matsuda, Harumi Sato, Fan Yang, Daniel Clausen, Kazuko Osada, and Koichi Hagimoto for their sincere encouragement and emotional support.

Finally, I wish to thank my beloved family: Tetsumaru, Keiko, and Kaori Yamada. They gave me the strength to carry on and the drive to succeed.

ABSTRACT OF THE DISSERTATION
THE DISCURSIVE CONSTRUCTION OF JAPANESE IDENTITY AND ITS HAUNTING OTHERS

by

Yoshiko Yamada

Florida International University, 2013

Miami, Florida

Professor François Debrix, Major Professor

This dissertation examined the formation of Japanese identity politics after World War II. Since World War II, Japan has had to deal with a contradictory image of its national self. On the one hand, as a nation responsible for colonizing fellow Asian countries in the 1930s and 1940s, Japan has struggled with an image/identity as a regional aggressor. On the other hand, having faced the harsh realities of defeat after the war, Japan has seen itself depicted as a victim. By employing the technique of discourse analysis as a way to study identity formation through official foreign policy documents and news media narratives, this study reconceptualized Japanese foreign policy as a set of discursive practices that attempt to produce renewed images of Japan's national self.

The dissertation employed case studies to analyze two key sites of Japanese postwar identity formation: (1) the case of Okinawa, an island/territory integral to postwar relations between Japan and the United States and marked by a series of US military rapes of native Okinawan girls; and (2) the case of comfort women in Japan and East Asia, which has led to Japan being blamed for its wartime sexual enslavement of Asian women. These case studies found that it was through coping with the haunting ghost of its wartime past that Japan sought to produce “postwar Japan” as an identity distinct from “wartime imperial Japan” or from “defeated, emasculated Japan” and, thus, hoped to emerge as a “reborn” moral and pacifist nation. The research showed that Japan struggled to invent a new self in a way that mobilized gendered dichotomies and, furthermore, created “others” who were not just spatially located (the United States, Asian neighboring nations) but also temporally marked (“old Japan”). The dissertation concluded that Japanese foreign policy is an ongoing struggle to define the Japanese national self vis-à-vis both spatial and historical “others,” and that, consequently, postwar Japan has always been haunted by its past self, no matter how much Japan’s foreign policy discourses were trying to make this past self into a distant or forgotten other.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGES
I. INTRODUCTION	1
Identity and Foreign Policy.....	3
Discourse Analysis.....	7
Cases of Identity Construction.....	11
Outline of the Dissertation	19
II. IDENTITY AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS THEORY	23
Wendt and Identity.....	28
Unit-level Constructivism: Overcoming Wendtian Constructivism?	33
Alternative Ontology of Identity: Poststructuralism.....	36
Three Dimensions of Identity: Spatiality, Temporality, and Ethicality	40
Insecurity as an Ontological Necessity?	43
Women and Foreign Policy	49
Women and Boundaries.....	53
Research Design.....	58
III. JAPANESE IDENTITY AND FOREIGN POLICY	64
Japanese Foreign Policy and the Reactive State Thesis.....	67
Japan and IR Theories.....	70
Constructivist Accounts of Japan’s Foreign Policy	76
Japan as a Discursive Construction.....	82
History Textbooks and the Discursive Construction of Postwar Japan	84
History Textbooks in the Early 1950s	89
Textbooks in 1966.....	93
1997 Textbooks.....	98
Textbooks after the 2001 Debate	104
Conclusion	109
IV. BETWEEN PARTNER AND OCCUPIED VICTIM: OKINAWA AS FEMALE BODY AND THE DESTABILIZATION OF A NEW JAPAN.....	111
Struggling with Defeat: Subjugated Nation, Subjugated Bodies, and Postwar Japan	119
Official Discourse: From Defeated State to Independent Nation and Reliable Ally	131
Repeated Crimes: The Rape of Okinawan School Girls.....	138
Media Discourses: The Rape of Okinawa and the Construction of a Feminized Okinawan Identity.....	142
Conclusion	152

V. THE COMFORT WOMEN ISSUE AND THE DISCURSIVE CONSTRUCTION OF “POSTWAR JAPAN”	155
Problematizing Comfort Women System.....	160
Defining Comfort Women: The Politics of Representation	165
Official Discourse: The Discursive Construction of “Postwar Japan”	174
Media Discourses: Posing Challenges to the Moral State	180
Conclusion	190
VI. CONCLUSION: UN PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS AND THE ENACTMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL JAPAN.....	193
REFERENCES	203
VITA.....	224

I. INTRODUCTION

The relationship between identity and foreign policy has been well studied by many International Relations (IR) scholars. For many of these scholars, identity is greatly relevant to foreign policy and to the political/policy behavior of states, providing meaningful explanations of how certain policy options are considered natural, normal, or legitimate as a response to given international political situations.

Japan is a sovereign state where foreign policy has been examined in terms of its profound implications for identity politics. While Japan's distinctiveness can be traced to its unique culture, its geographical location, and its history, many have suggested that the end of World War II is a critical point in Japanese identity formation in relation to its foreign policy. Indeed, the defeat in the war posed such unexpected challenges to the sense of Japanese national pride and honor that the Japanese self had to be reconstructed from the ground up after the war. The Japanese self that had been produced by, and had provided the foundation for, Japanese imperial projects prior to WWII was completely challenged by the total destruction of imperial Japan and the subsequent occupation by the Allies. In this context, the questions of "who we were" and "who we are now" for Japan were repeatedly asked in the postwar era, with the result that competing discourses about the self and others were inevitably produced.

What postwar Japan had to face were two different realities. The first reality was that Japan was now a defeated nation. Most major cities were destroyed by air raids; the cities of Hiroshima and Nagasaki disappeared as a result of the dropping of the atomic bombs; and the country was for the first time occupied and controlled by a foreign power.

The overwhelming presence of the victorious United States in Japan had a significant impact on the Japanese redefinition of the national self, often leading to Japan identifying itself as a “war victim” now faced with a victorious occupier.

Since Japan regained its sovereignty in 1952, it has been striving to transform its relationship with the United States and to put an end to this “victor-loser relationship.” Although claiming to have become a US ally, Japan to this day is still haunted by a sense of victimhood reproduced and reinforced through war memorials and the presence of US military bases built during the period of US occupation. In particular, American military bases, although essential for Japan’s national defense, tend to destabilize Japan’s projected identity as an independent and sovereign state. Therefore, military bases become crucial sites of Japanese identity formation vis-à-vis the United States. In a way, the issue of the alliance with the United States is not only about Japan’s defense and foreign policy. It is also, and primarily, a question of identity.

While a sense of victimhood still lies at the core of the Japanese collective self today, postwar Japan has also been confronted with another reality: that of being a former barbaric aggressor state. Japan’s brutal acts during WWII were tried in the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, resulting in mass executions and punishments of Japanese war criminals. After normalizing diplomatic relations with neighboring Asian states after the war, Japan still had to face issues of war reparation and compensation. Overcoming the legacy of World War II and Asia’s mistrust has thus been an important agenda in postwar Japanese foreign policy. Wartime reparation issues are, indeed, repeatedly raised throughout Asia, thus contributing to the continued image of Japan as an international aggressor. Asian nations keep reminding Japan of its haunting wartime legacy allegedly left behind by its past self. Lingering anti-Japanese sentiments in Asia overshadow diplomatic relations. And history still creates serious foreign policy issues that can easily ruin Japanese efforts to build renewed relations with the nations of Asia.

These conflicting identities as victim and aggressor have long shaped Japan's national self. Japan's fragmented identity is continuously reproduced vis-à-vis these significant others through a variety of foreign policy issues. Japan, therefore, continues to struggle to distance itself from its past, both as a former victim and a former aggressor. Although identity can be considered to constitute the foundation of foreign policy and thus have certain political "effects," this dissertation seeks to conceptualize Japanese foreign policy as a continual process through which the Japanese self is produced performatively in relation to foreign and external others. The approach I take in this research is derived from poststructuralist theory of International Relations. This specific analytical perspective allows me to examine the dynamic processes of state identity-making in Japan. In the following section, I briefly introduce poststructuralism and another competing theory of identity construction prevalent in IR circles known as constructivism (I describe these two theories in more details in Chapter II).

Identity and Foreign Policy

In recent years, the question of identity has become one of the core issues within the discipline of International Relations. Although many mainstream and traditional approaches to IR have neglected the social dimension of international relations, treating states' interests and identities as pre-given, more scholars of late have focused on identity as an important variable to explore the social construction of states and the states system (Bar-Tal 2000; Katzenstein 1996a; 1996b; Telhami and Barnett 2002). In the constructivist IR tradition, Alexander Wendt, for example, has argued that states are inherently social constructions whose identities and interests are shaped and reshaped through processes of their own interaction. As states define “who we are” and “what we want” in relation to others, Wendt argues, state interactions are not only key to the social construction of states but also provide the foundation for the international social structures within which states give meaning to their action (Wendt 1992; 1999). Indeed, state practices determine the nature of the international structure, while changes in state behavior can develop different institutions under a condition of international anarchy. International structure is, in this sense, a social construction that has no intrinsic or essential logic of its own. Rather, state practices constitute the basis for international institutions, while these institutions, in turn, reshape state identities and interests. That is, state actors and international institutions are mutually constitutive.

Constructivist studies, therefore, suggest the importance of identity and other ideational/cultural factors as variables to explain state behavior. “There is a shared presumption among the identity scholars in IR that identity is a source of an actor’s behavior and is therefore fundamental,” Kuniko Ashizawa writes (2008, 577). State behavior/foreign policy is shaped, if not determined, by the state’s understanding of “who we are” and “who they (others) are,” an understanding that helps the state define its interests and/or preferences. Describing foreign policy as a state’s action “made in order to fulfill a given preference, which is defined in terms of value (pro-attitude) perceived by agents of the state or decision makers,” Ashizawa thus argues that “a conception of state identity provides policymakers with a particular value, which sometimes becomes the dominant value, and hence, defines the preference of state foreign policy” (2008, 580, 581). Constructivists, in this sense, assert that there is a constitutive relationship between identity and foreign policy that should explain how particular practices are preferred while others are omitted from policy options.

While this approach is widely accepted in the discipline today, other scholars have pointed to the limitations of this perspective and have drawn attention to the question of identity from a different perspective. In contrast to constructivists, poststructuralists have focused on the discursive production of identity by treating identity as an effect of discourse that is generated and sustained through a repeated practice of signification. In other words, poststructuralist scholars consider identity to result from representational practices, that is to say, the very representations and expressions of “what we/others are” give meanings and endow “us” or “them” with particular identity traits or features.

The idea that identity is primarily a discursive construction fundamentally goes against the constructivist understanding of identity as something that can be possessed by a (preexisting) subject and acquired through social processes or interactions. Indeed, constructivist studies of foreign policy presuppose a political subject who perceives “what it is” and “what it wants” and acts accordingly. Thus, for constructivists, a subject’s identity can be regarded as a variable and as ontologically separable or distinct from foreign policy. By contrast, in drawing attention to discursive practices of foreign policy, poststructuralists look into the very processes through which the state self is articulated as “an initiator of action, a formulator of policy, an assessor of situations, and a definer of problems,” that is to say, a political subject in whose name foreign policy operates (Doty 1993, 313). In this respect, poststructuralists observe that foreign policy is precisely a site or domain where the state is constituted “as it is” by performance, and that the state “has no ontological status apart from the various acts which constitute its reality” (Butler 1990, 173). In other words, identity is not causally separable from foreign policy. There is, rather, a “co-constitutive” relationship between foreign policy and identity. And “identities are articulated as the reason why policies should be enacted, but they are also (re)produced through these very policy discourses: they are simultaneously (discursive) foundation and product” (Hansen 2006, 19).

Accordingly, the poststructuralist conceptualization of identity makes it possible to critically question the notions of subject, agent, and identity, and thus to “shift analysis from assumptions about pre-given subjects to the problematic of subjectivity and its political enactment” (Campbell 2007, 219). Such a shift enables one to explore more carefully the dynamic nature of identity formation because identity exists “only insofar as it is continuously rearticulated and uncontested by competing discourses” (Hansen 2006, 5). Therefore, as what poststructuralists call a discursive construction, “the subject is always in the process of being constituted,” that is to say, it is always “incomplete,” “unfinished,” and “unsettled” (Edkins and Pin-Fat 1999, 1).

In this sense, central to a poststructuralist analysis of foreign policy is the discursive construction of subjects and its political and ethical outcomes, or what is often called “how-possible” questions. More precisely, unlike conventional “why-questions” asked by IR scholars in which analysis is “concerned with explaining why particular decisions resulting in specific courses of action were made,” “how-possible” questions ask “how meanings are produced and attached to various social subjects/objects, thus constituting particular interpretive dispositions which create certain possibilities and preclude others” (Doty 1993, 298, emphasis in original). That is, by examining foreign policy discourse, this type of analysis calls into question what is presupposed by the more conventional “why-questions,” or “a particular subjectivity (i.e., a mode of being), a background of social/discursive practices and meanings which make possible the practices as well as the social actors themselves” (Doty 1993, 298). By doing so, this poststructuralist approach de-naturalizes what is taken-for-granted and thereby reveals how certain policies, beliefs, and behaviors become meaningful and legitimate as a result of the way “reality” is discursively articulated.

Discourse Analysis

As suggested above, the key to a poststructuralist analysis of identity is paying close attention to the role of discourse. Discourse “refers to a specific series of representations and practices through which meanings are produced, identities constituted, social relations established, and political and ethical outcomes made more or less possible” (Campbell 2007, 216). The term “discourse” would suggest that language plays an important role in producing discursive effects. Many poststructuralist studies of identity are based on particular understandings of language. Thus, concepts such as “intertextuality,” “performativity,” and “iterability” lie at the core of these analyses (Debrix 2003a; Doty 1993; Hansen 2006). Poststructuralists accordingly engage in an analysis of various texts, including official documents, speeches, statements, newspapers, and academic literature. As Campbell’s definition implies, however, discourse also refers to broad representational practices. As such, discursive practices are not restricted to linguistic representations. For example, Lene Hansen (2006) suggests that, in addition to the texts mentioned above, we could also include other textual sources in the analysis, such as film, television, computer games, photography, comics, music, painting, and architecture. Diverse modes of representation or signification are increasingly studied by many scholars today (Butler 2009; Campbell 2003; 2007; Dittmer 2005; Hansen 2006; Sharp 1996; Shapiro 2009; Weber 2006). Each of these representational forms provides a rich source of discourse, creating social realities, and thus producing political outcomes.

Indeed, any type of text—written, spoken, cinematic, or even visual—should be “situated inside a larger intertextual web that traces intertextual references to other texts, thereby bringing in sources that are constructed either as supporting influences or as texts in need of repudiation” (Hansen 2006, 53). The key to this conception is the notion of intertextuality (Der Derian and Shapiro 1989). In other words, Hansen (2006, 49) explains: “all texts make references, explicitly or implicitly, to previous ones, and in doing so, they both establish their own reading and become mediations on the meaning and status of others. The meaning of a text is thus never fully given by the text itself but is always a product of other readings and interpretations.” Put differently, every text is interlinked with other texts in that it refers to prior texts and/or is based on conceptions, analogies, and categories developed by, and shared with, other texts. In this sense, as direct or indirect references to other texts construct a complex and boundlessly expanding intertextual link that “produces mutual legitimacy and creates an exchange at the level of meaning,” any text is “always located within a shared textual space” (Hansen 2006, 51, 49).

The notion of intertextuality, accordingly, indicates that even official statements should not be seen as “entities standing separately from wider societal discourses but as entities located beyond other policy texts, into journalism, academic writing, popular non-fiction, and, potentially, even fiction” (Hansen 2006, 49). For instance, a magazine constitutes a site where popular imaginings of the international landscape are performatively constructed, while cultural/political norms (“common sense”) are also produced and reproduced (Sharp 1996). The popular magazines can be, thus, seen as “the very nexus of power/knowledge central to the workings of geopolitics,” providing wider societal and cultural resources with which foreign policy converges (Sharp 1996, 568).

To note, discourse analysis is a form of analysis that involves “the detailed explication of the discourse itself. This consists of examining various textual mechanisms at work in the discourse that construct identities for subjects and position these subjects vis-à-vis one another” (Doty 1993, 304). This also means that poststructuralists do not see various ways of representation as mere “tools” of signification or communication. As Hansen (2006, 16) notes:

To poststructuralism, language is ontologically significant, it is only through the construction in language that “things”—objects, subjects, states, living beings, and material structures—are given meaning and endowed with a particular identity. Language is not a transparent tool functioning as a medium for the registration of data as (implicitly) assumed by positivist, empiricist science, but a field of social and political practice, and hence there is no objective or “true meaning” beyond the linguistic representation to which one can refer.

That language is not a practical “tool” or “instrument” to represent things, but is both productive and constitutive of meaning, implies that the very acts of representation “constitute the objects of which they speak”—that is, language is “performative” (Campbell 2007, 216). Roxanne Lynne Doty (1993, 302) also writes:

A discursive practice is not traceable to a fixed and stable center, e.g., individual consciousness or a social collective. Discursive practices that constitute subjects and modes of subjectivity are dispersed, scattered throughout various locales. This is why the notion of intertextuality is important. Texts always refer back to other texts which themselves refer to still other texts. The power that is inherent in language is thus not something that is centralized, emanating from a pre-given subject. Rather, like the discursive practices in which it inheres, power is dispersed and, most important, is productive of subjects and their worlds.

In the poststructuralist analysis of discourse, thus, the object of analysis is what language “does” (Debrix 2003a). Individuals using language are not seen as “the loci of meaning” (Doty 1993, 302). Subjectivity is rather a discursive construct.

To conduct discourse analysis, poststructuralists have developed various approaches (Milliken 1999). As Jennifer Milliken (1999, 231) writes, “there is no single method for analysis and abstraction along these lines, but rather a number of ways that scholars can identify key aspects of significant practices and, based on their study, establish a discourse.” Yet, it is common among poststructuralists to study predicates such as verbs, adverbs, and adjectives attached to nouns or “things” being constructed. These predicates give “things” attributes and establish relations between them (opposition, similarity, and complementarity, for example) whereby social realities are performatively constructed (Doty 1993; Milliken 1999). Further, poststructuralists analyze political and ethical effects created by discourses. That is, discourses authorize, legitimize, and naturalize certain possibilities (such as foreign policy options) while silencing/excluding others.

It is important to keep in mind that the subjects constructed by discourse are always uncertain, unstable, and unfinished. As the notion of intertextuality suggests, discourse operates within “a complex and infinitely expanding web of possible meanings” (Doty 1993, 203). As such, intertextual links at times reinforce but at other times challenge meanings. The idea of intertextuality, however, does not deny the formation of dominant discourses, as an intertextual web often produces mutual legitimization, thereby making some discourses more powerful than others. However, there also exist competing discourses that would revise, contradict, or challenge dominant discourses. In this respect, discursive spaces always encompass competing meanings, and the competition between these various meanings can never be definitively settled (Weber 2006). As Cynthia Weber (2006, 165) puts it, identity is, therefore, “a place to which we may aspire but at which we will never arrive.” There is no stable, finished identity as such; that is, it is impossible to “be an identity.”

Cases of Identity Construction

Following the poststructuralist conception of identity as a discursive construct, which can thus be studied by discourse analysis, my dissertation seeks to explain how Japan discursively or performatively constructs itself as a reborn nation by creating and externalizing otherness through a continual process of foreign policy. In order to explore this process, two major foreign policy issues critical to the construction of postwar Japan will be analyzed. As mentioned above, postwar Japan’s identity is split and confused. The United States and neighboring Asian nations, in particular, constitute important others for Japan. Thus, in my dissertation, I focus on specific issues of Japanese foreign policy that have arisen with these key others. Here, I look in turn at these issues and give a brief overview of my case studies.

The first case study will focus on the so-called Okinawa problem. Okinawa is the southernmost Japanese prefecture consisting of many small tropical islands. Okinawa provides a pertinent study in my dissertation for two reasons. First, Okinawa has been key in defining Japan's relations with the United States since the end of World War Two. During the war, Okinawa became one of the few places where Japan and the United States fought a ground war within the present-day boundaries of Japan. Remembered as one of the most brutal and bloodiest battles between the two nations, the Battle of Okinawa resulted in the sacrifice of one quarter of the local population and reduced much of the islands to rubble. Indeed, the Battle of Okinawa is also called the "Typhoon of Steel." The US military indiscriminately destroyed houses, cities, towns, cultural heritage, forests, and even farmland by air raids, flamethrowers, and, most notably, massive bombardment by warship cannons firing hundreds of thousands of tons of artillery. Most importantly, as a result of the Battle, Okinawa was detached from the rest of Japan and fell under the direct military control of the United States. Considering the islands to be a strategically important location, US forces constructed military facilities all around Okinawa and practically transformed the territory into "base islands" that played a crucial part as America's military stronghold in the Pacific.

Okinawa was finally returned to Japan in 1972. That year marked the formal end of US postwar occupation of the Japanese territory. Nevertheless, upon Okinawa's reversion to Japan, American military bases that had long symbolized the foreign occupation of Okinawa were given a new role as the "cornerstone" of Japan-US security arrangements, which, since the independence of postwar Japan, have largely determined the path of the relationship between Japan and the United States. Although still a symbol of US domination and a reminder of the victimhood of Japan, these US military bases today also serve as the foundation of the current Japan-US partnership, thus epitomizing the new phase in the bilateral relationship.

Okinawa accordingly lies at the heart of Japanese collective memory and of Japan's national imagination about "who we are." Indeed, how to remember the history of Okinawa goes straight to the question of Japan's identity since Okinawa is a symbol of Japan's wartime victimhood vis-à-vis the United States and its postwar (and ongoing) subjugation to the victor country. And yet, Okinawa also offers the symbol of a renewed relationship between Japan and the United States as strategic security partners or even close friends. Japan, thus, can be represented as a state that has transformed itself from a subjugated state to become a respectable "partner" of the United States, even though the uninterrupted presence of the US military in Okinawa also suggests that Japan is in a continuous state of subjugation vis-à-vis a foreign power. Although, in the first perspective, Okinawa makes possible the image of a "new" Japan that has overcome the past, in the second perspective, Okinawa indeed represents what Japan "was": a miserable occupied and subjugated nation, the haunting ghost of Japan's new self.

The unique history of Okinawa giving it two conflicting identities leads to the second reason why we should see the Okinawa problem as a critical site for the performative construction of Japan. Okinawa offers an interesting case because it is key to the demarcation of Japanese national space. Okinawa's unique history shows that Okinawa has been situated "inside" and "outside" of Japan many times. In fact, until the 19th century, Okinawa was known as the Ryukyu Kingdom, an independent state that maintained close relationships with both China and Japan. After the Ryukyu Kingdom was annexed to Japan in the 1870s, the Japanese government gave it a prefectural status and renamed it Okinawa. And yet, the US invasion of 1945 resulted in the separation of Okinawa from Japan's main islands, and Okinawa was once again placed outside of Japan. Although Okinawa was returned to Japan in 1972, and the Japanization of Okinawans has since been promoted, there remains a deep cleavage between Okinawa and mainland Japan. Not only the legacy of the occupation such as the high concentration of US military bases in Okinawa, but also its weak economy provide the lingering image of Okinawa as backward, underdeveloped, dependent, occupied, and subjugated. In this way, it is an "internal other" in relation to Japan. Okinawa is therefore also where the "foreign" or the "outside" is constituted, a place where the spatial boundaries of Japan are constantly made and remade. But Okinawa is a site where the temporal boundaries of Japan are created too in the sense that Okinawa is an ever present reminder of Japan's past self, something that Japan struggles to forget and wants to remove from within.

Given that Campbell (1992, 75) defines foreign policy as "one of the boundary-producing practices central to the production and reproduction of the identity in whose name it operates," the issues concerning Okinawa lie at the heart of Japanese foreign policy. Indeed, Japanese foreign policy can be redefined as a set of practices that establish the boundaries of the Japanese self while excluding the "difference" that constitutes the "foreign" and/or the (spatial/temporal) other for Japan.

Methodologically speaking, the discourse of Okinawa can be traced back to a variety of texts, including governmental statements, newspaper articles, films, and photography. In this dissertation, to examine how different identities about Japan are created, I carefully read Japan's defense white papers as constitutive of official discourses and newspaper editorials as representative of media discourses on the Okinawa problem. In examining media discourse, I place a particular focus on US military rapes of Okinawan girls as manifestations of the Okinawa problem. Although constituting less than 2% of the entire crimes committed by the US military personnel in Okinawa,¹ rapes tend to become highly political issues as they evoke strong hostile sentiments toward the US military throughout Japan and in Okinawa in particular. Indeed, as my research will suggest, rape victims are presented as sexualized/gendered symbols of Okinawa's historical victimhood in the media narratives of the rapes. They are symbols of the US violation and domination of Japan's "internal" space. In the discussion of these "incidents," therefore, Okinawa's victimhood—and thus, its feminized identity—is continually reproduced. The Okinawa problem represents Japan's continued weakness and emasculation vis-à-vis the United States, and it is shown to be the haunting shadow in the Japan-US alliance.

While discursive representations of Okinawa position Japan as the victim in contrast with the victorious and hyper-masculine United States, Asian nations such as China and South Korea challenge such representations about Japanese victimhood. In relation to its Asian neighbors, Japan is confronted with its history as a former aggressor. This dissertation, therefore, takes up the relationship between Japan and other Asian states as a second key case study. More specifically, I focus on the “comfort women” issue that evidences Japan’s brutality during World War II.

¹ Oga, Kazuo, "Kisha no me: Okinawa joji boko jiken: Chii kyotei dake ni torawarezu kichi no sonzai koso saiko wo" [Journalist's Eyes: The Rape of a Female Child in Okinawa: Reconsider Not Only the SOFA But Also the Military Presence], Mainichi Shinbun, 26 September, 1995.

It is well known that a substantial number of women served the Japanese Imperial Military as “comfort women”—women who provided sexual comfort for Japanese soldiers. For decades, the comfort women issue has been an object of international criticism as it is widely believed that these women were forcibly recruited from among women in Japanese controlled territories, and that the comfort women system was nothing less than a form of sexual exploitation or enslavement of Asian women by imperial Japan. Since the early 1990s, a number of resolutions against the comfort women system have been adopted in foreign parliaments, while the United Nations Human Rights Commission has published reports on the issue that have described comfort women as “sex slaves” and acknowledged that the enslavement and rape of these women constitute “crimes against humanity” (Coomaraswamy 1996; McDougall 1998).

Although the number of comfort women is still unknown, it has been officially disclosed by the Japanese government that the so-called comfort stations existed in Japan and in many of the then Japanese-occupied territories, including China, Korea, the Philippines, Indonesia, Malaysia, Thailand, Burma, Hong Kong, Macao, French Indo-China, and New Guinea (Naikaku kanbo gaisei shingi shitsu 1993). Most of the comfort women were from Korea, but there were also women from Japan, China, Taiwan, the Philippines, Indonesia, and the Netherlands. While it is still being debated whether the comfort women were recruited forcefully or voluntarily (Soh 1996; 2003), it is widely agreed that the comfort women were forced to live under harsh conditions and that many of them became ill or even died as a result of their service.

The wartime comfort women system was accordingly politicized and has been construed as a diplomatic issue between Japan and the former victim states. In response to criticisms from governments and various international forums, the Japanese government formally apologized to the victims and established the Asian Women's Fund as a vehicle to launch national atonement projects. The issue of the comfort women has thus become a major war responsibility for Japan vis-à-vis former victim states. It has thus tested postwar Japan's resolve to become a "responsible" state that can overcome the difficult legacies from its past and to transform the old victim-aggressor relationship.

The comfort women issue can be seen as a crucial aspect of Japanese foreign policy since official statements on this question constitute a textual/discursive domain where Japan's spatial, temporal, and ethical identities are performatively created. Indeed, from a poststructuralist perspective, to talk about the "past" is nothing less than to construct the "past" self, which is typically positioned vis-à-vis the "present" self. In other words, by making statements and sending apologies, Japan can performatively try to turn postwar Japan into a "new" self while externalizing the "evil" elements within and attributing them to "wartime Japan." Official statements are thus the site where postwar Japan can be constructed as a new identity—pacifist, responsible, respectable, and sympathetic to victims of the former war. In this sense, war responsibility issues are opportunities for postwar Japan, while they are also what Japan must overcome to be demarcated from its old wartime self.

Today, the comfort women issue is considered to have been completely settled by the Japanese government. Thus, the government currently does not take any action toward the survivors or is not willing to talk about the issue with other Asian governments. Instead, a series of competing discourses are continuously created in society, and official accounts of the comfort women issue are now being seriously challenged. In fact, despite the repeated official statements acknowledging remorse for the comfort women system and wartime aggression, these statements have never amounted to a powerful political discourse. On the one hand, many Japanese still question the existence of the comfort women during the war and/or the forceful recruitment of these women by the military (Jeans 2005; Soh 2003). The conservatives accordingly deny the responsibility of Japan toward these Asian women, inviting strong renewed international criticisms of Japan. On the other hand, the progressive camp problematizes the qualitative difference between wartime and postwar governments, maintaining that the government has not fully fulfilled its responsibility as a former aggressor.

Thus, in this second case study, I analyze how postwar Japan is discursively constructed in official discourses and how such discourses have been reinforced and/or challenged by wider societal discourses, particularly newspaper editorials discussing this issue. Just like Okinawan rape victims, comfort women as symbols of “Asian” victims allow Japan to inscribe the discursive boundaries of the national space, or the “inside,” in relation to Asia as the “outside.” Further, the issue enables a discursive space where the “temporal” and “ethical” boundaries between aggressive wartime Japan and moral postwar Japan are made and remade. Therefore, the analysis of the comfort women issue makes it possible to explore the performative formation of postwar Japan faced with another postwar reality as a former assailant.

Together, these two case studies will not only show the delicate dilemmas that underpin Japan's conflicted postwar identity, but will also reveal that Japanese subjectivity is always incomplete and unfinished. Japan is always haunted by various forms of otherness that it struggles to exclude from within. And yet, when confronted by different foreign policy issues that destabilize its spatial, temporal, and ethical boundaries, Japan can performatively recreate "what it is." In this sense, these haunting legacies of the war actually provide the possibility for Japan to continuously reproduce its identity. It is in this continuous process to constitute the reality of "Japan" that Japanese subjectivity comes into being and is thereby made possible.

Outline of the Dissertation

The dissertation consists of four chapters. Chapter II will explore different theories of and approaches to identity (particularly, state and national identity) in the discipline of International Relations. In particular, Chapter II will analyze two theoretical traditions that examine the relations between identity and foreign policy: constructivism and poststructuralism. In Chapter II, I will demonstrate that constructivist arguments, including systemic and unit-level constructivist theories, make sense only if there is a pre-social/pre-discursive state actor that has a sense of self and shapes its social identity through interactions with other states. By showing how poststructuralism denaturalizes this pre-existing self and offers a way to study identity without essentializing political subjects, Chapter II will establish the theoretical grounds for the research conducted in the following chapters. Moreover, in Chapter II, I will explain the importance of examining women's issues not only as foreign policy issues, but also as national identity questions. I will argue that, although these issues tend to be seen as marginal or irrelevant in mainstream International Relations/Foreign Policy Analysis, women's issues can constitute the space where the state performatively produces its reality and creates the boundaries between the inside and the outside. The cases of international rapes are particularly meaningful as crucial sites that reproduce—but also can disrupt—the national boundaries that make the feminine body a battleground for identity construction.

Chapter III will focus on various current literatures on Japanese foreign policy. It will show how non-poststructuralist studies provide differing explanations of Japanese policy while naturalizing Japan as an international actor. Further, the chapter conducts an analysis of Japanese junior high school textbooks to show how history is narrated and how historical narratives can construct various Japanese selves. Although some constructivists believe that Japanese statehood has a “reality” independent of the social context and that its history provides an important source of national identity, through the analysis of history textbooks, I will show that various discourses on Japanese national history are not simply discussions of historical facts but are rather actively productive of “who we were” and “who we are.” I suggest in Chapter III that we need to shift the focus from the historical formation of Japan's identity to the question of the discursive enactment of “Japan.”

In Chapters IV and V, I will conduct case studies of two key sites of national/state identity formation identified above to demonstrate the performative construction of Japan's identity: (1) the Okinawa problem, as integral to the postwar relations between Japan and the United States and as symbolized in US military rapes of Okinawan girls; and (2) the comfort women issue, whereby Japan has been blamed for its wartime sexual enslavement of Asian women. By focusing on women's issues, these two case studies aim to characterize the conflicted images of postwar Japan as both a "victim" of crushing attacks by the United States and a former "aggressor" in Asia.

These two case studies are based on detailed textual/discursive analyses of government statements, policy papers, and newspaper editorials. Employing discourse analysis as a way of studying official foreign policy discourse and wider political debates allows me to explain that, while Japan is still haunted by the ghosts of its own past (as represented by Okinawa and the former comfort women), it is by dealing with the legacy of its past that Japan performatively produces and reproduces its renewed identity, namely, its image as a "reborn" pacifist Japan. And yet, these studies will also demonstrate that, despite such attempts, Japan has been left with a sense of self that is both confused and confusing. It is in this context that I suggest the need to interpret Japanese foreign policy as a continual process whereby Japan seeks and struggles to create a new Japanese self rather than as a reaction to established structural elements, situations, and behaviors in international relations and foreign policy.

Looked at from this point of view, Japan's attitude vis-à-vis the United Nations or other international organizations can also be explained as the performative construction of a national self now desirous to pass for a pacifist agent who is eager to leave behind its 20th century image inherited from a less than glorious past. Therefore, in the conclusion, I examine how Japan has been trying to overcome its fragmented and split identity by briefly examining recent Japanese policies toward the United Nations. More recently, the United Nations has been a place/institution where Japan has sought to offer a contribution, not only as a defeated nation that genuinely looks for a better world, but also as a former aggressor nation that is determined to recreate itself as a “reborn” moral and globally responsible nation. Thus, by briefly analyzing the discursive construction of the meaning of more recent Japanese contributions to the UN and its organizations, I hope to conclude that Japanese foreign policy is constantly trying to overcome its contradictory senses of self through a larger investment in global peace and security, something that I believe is likely to provide a foreign policy direction for Japan over the next decades.

II. IDENTITY AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS THEORY

The so-called “reflectivist turn” (Keohane 1988) has brought identity to the fore of the discipline of International Relations. The reflectivist turn has not only been a challenge to rationalist theory in which identities and interests are pre-given, but it has also been a challenge for IR scholars to develop new approaches to international relations, using different ontological, epistemological, and methodological bases. In other words, the turn to identity has allowed researchers to problematize taken-for-granted assumptions about the nature of the state, the international system, and world politics and to question how their reality is constituted socially, linguistically, and/or performatively.

The present chapter examines two different but important approaches to identity in International Relations: constructivism and poststructuralism. The turn to identity in International Relations is largely owed to these two theoretical traditions. Constructivism today enjoys the status of one of the mainstream approaches to international relations. Stephen M. Walt (1998), in his reflections upon IR theory after the end of Cold War, describes constructivism as one of the three major paradigms in International Relations, alongside realism and liberalism. Although “realism remains the most compelling general framework for understanding international relations,” Walt (1998, 43, 44) notes, “constructivist theories are best suited to the analysis of how identities and interests can change over time, thereby producing subtle shifts in the behavior of states and occasionally triggering far-reaching but unexpected shifts in international affairs.” In this sense, Walt (1998, 44) advises that “the ‘complete diplomat’ of the future should remain cognizant of realism’s emphasis on the inescapable role of power, keep liberalism’s awareness of domestic forces in mind, and occasionally reflect on constructivism's vision of change." Similarly, in their account of the evolution of the study of international political economy and, more generally, of world politics, Peter J. Katzenstein, Robert O. Keohane, and Stephen D. Krasner (1998) consider constructivism to be one of the two prevailing theories of International Relations. They represent IR scholarship as shaped by a theoretical contestation between rationalism and constructivism, a debate promoting knowledge and understanding about international relations by complementing each other.

It is important to note that the boundaries of constructivism remain fuzzy, and the label is assigned to many different studies of IR. As Steve Smith (2001a, 40) rightly writes, "even to talk of 'a' social constructivism is problematic." For example, there are major differences between those constructivists who are primarily concerned about speech acts and the linguistic construction of the world, on the one hand, and those who pay little attention to the role of language, on the other (Debrix 2003b; Fierke 1996; Kubalkova 2001; Kubalkova, Onuf, and Kowert 1998; Onuf 1989; 1998). In the above-mentioned article, Katzenstein, Keohane, and Krasner (1998, 675-78) argue that constructivism includes three broad clusters: "conventional," "critical," and "postmodern." Likewise, defining constructivists as those "who believe that international structure consists fundamentally in shared knowledge, and that this affects not only state behavior, but state identities and interests as well," a notable constructivist scholar Alexander Wendt (1999, 31, 32) places the English School approach, the World Society School, postmodernism, and feminism into constructivism. Smith (2001a, 40) argues against these broad classifications, noting that those approaches categorized as "constructivism" rest on "fundamentally opposed epistemological positions." In fact, as I will discuss below, there are essential differences between constructivist and postmodernist (poststructuralist) modes of analysis, which in turn give rise to competing approaches to identity.

In my research, therefore, I treat constructivism and poststructuralism as two different theories of International Relations. The current chapter first looks into the constructivist theory of identity. In my analysis of constructivism, I particularly focus on arguments developed by Alexander Wendt. Wendt is one of the most cited constructivists. Both his 1992 article, “Anarchy Is What States Make of It,” and his 1999 book, Social Theory of International Politics, are well known. Most importantly, Wendt offers a detailed analysis of the nature and evolution of state identity, which provides a relevant starting point for the critical study of identity. In addition, I briefly look at works by Peter J. Katzenstein and some other constructivists to examine different constructivist studies of identity. While Wendt is known as a systemic theorist, Katzenstein draws attention to domestic processes of identity formation. By comparing systemic and unit-level analyses of identity, I intend to make clear the characteristics as well as limitations of constructivism.

In contrast to constructivism that is generally accepted among the mainstream IR scholarship, poststructuralism is often regarded as a series of more radical approaches to International Relations. The criticism is partly because of a distinction made between positivism and post-positivism, a distinction allowing positivists to define the boundary of “an inner circle in IR” (Fierke 2003). The distinction not only divides IR scholars who disagree over epistemological, ontological, and methodological viewpoints into mutually exclusive camps, but it also creates a disciplinary hierarchy between these camps as a result of a widely shared belief in “social science” (S. Smith 1996; Wæver 1996a). According to Katzenstein, Keohane, and Krasner (1998, 678), postmodernism, located in the post-positivist camp, denies “the use of evidence to adjudicate between truth claims,” “risks becoming self-referential and disengaged from the world,” and “falls clearly outside of the social science enterprise.” As Keohane once indicated, a particular form of research program is clearly privileged in the discipline: the one involving the formulation and testing of hypotheses, without which scholars “will remain on the margins of the field” (Keohane 1988, 392). The division, accordingly, “purposefully place[s] someone outside the boundaries of the debate” by labeling one who questions the possibility of social science as a “post-positivist” (Fierke 2003, 70). For positivists, post-positivists have developed a new “language” of International Relations, which, without a translator, cannot be understood by mainstream scholars (Fierke 2003, 72).

While some mainstream scholars criticize poststructuralism for having nothing to contribute to the discipline other than critiques of existing theories (Kubalkova, Onuf, and Kowert 1998, 20; Mearsheimer 1994/95, 38; Walt 1991, 223), poststructuralists have developed unique theoretical and research frameworks to study identity, discourse, and international politics. In particular, David Campbell (1992) and Lene Hansen (2006) provide fresh insights into identity formation that will provide an alternative approach to constructivism for the present study. In their respective works, Campbell and Hansen examine the construction of state identity through discursive practices of foreign policy. Interestingly, they define identity as an effect of discourse. In other words, they argue that identity exists “only insofar as it is continuously rearticulated and uncontested by competing discourses” (Hansen 2006, 5). This imply that identity is no more than a discursively constructed “idea,” and that there are no objective identities that exist outside discourse. Poststructuralists, thus, bring into the discipline discourse analysis as a new way of analyzing identity, whereby the performativity of discourses, or the discursive construction of identities and its political and ethical outcomes, become central to the analysis. That is to say, contrary to the constructivist conception, poststructuralists assert that a discursive construction of identity cannot be “possessed” by a preexisting subject who will go on to take action based on a given definition of the self. Rather, the discursive construction of “reality” must be problematized, and poststructuralism “moves us away from a reliance on the idea of (social) construction towards materialization” of subjects and objects (Campbell 2007, 216-17, emphasis in original).

Through analyzing two different theories of identity, I seek to establish the theoretical foundations for the present research. Further, I turn to feminist studies that will give us an insightful additional point of view as to what constitutes a site of foreign policy. Generally, women’s issues are not considered central to foreign policy analysis. However, feminist studies reveal that women’s experiences are constitutive of international relations and that, without women, international politics cannot operate as it does. Women’s integral roles in world politics suggest the importance of reevaluating the relevance of women’s issues to international problems and seeing these issues as issues of international politics and foreign policy. Feminist perspectives, thus, make it possible to shed new light on marginal issues of foreign policy and to reconceptualize them as central to state practices or discourses of foreign policy. Lastly, in the last section of the chapter, I try to form a research design for the present study. I primarily follow Hansen’s research design for poststructuralist discourse analysis (Hansen 2006). The chapter will accordingly provide a theoretical and methodological framework for the following chapters.

Wendt and Identity

Wendt (1992; 1999) posits that states are inherently social actors that acquire identities and define interests through processes of interaction among themselves. Wendt's argument constitutes a powerful challenge to a rationalist account of international relations in which the identities and interests of states are exogenously given. Rationalism, by taking a behavioralist approach to international relations, makes foundational assumptions about the nature of states. That is, it assumes that states are atomistic, self-interested, and rational. These assumptions, in turn, provide grounds for theories that emphasize the presence of "atomistic rational beings that form social relations to maximize their interests" in a purely "strategic" arena of international relations (Reus-Smit 2005, 192; see also Keohane 1988). Wendt's challenge, in this sense, lies in its focus on the "social construction" of states and their international environment. In other words, Wendt stresses that "these self-interested actors indeed had a self; that this self coloured their interactions with other states; and that these interactions between the selves of states in turn shaped some of the structures within which ulterior interactions take place" (Epstein 2010, 329).

According to Wendt, contrary to the rationalist argument, identities and interests are endogenous to social interaction. State actors engage in social acts—signaling, interpreting, and responding—the reciprocal processes of which "create relatively stable concepts of self and other regarding the issue at stake in the interaction" (Wendt 1992, 405). More precisely, social interaction allows states to develop expectations with regard to their future behavior vis-à-vis each other, and thereby to generate ideas about who “they” are and who “we” are, ideas through which states acquire identities or “relatively stable, role-specific understandings and expectations about self” (Wendt 1992, 397). National interests presuppose these socially constructed identities “because an actor cannot know what it wants until it knows who it is” (Wendt 1999, 231). In fact, interests depend on how the state “define[s] certain situations as calling for certain actions” or how it “view[s] the meaning and requirements” of those perceived situations based on the particular definition given to the self (Wendt 1992, 398, 402).

Identities and interests are, in this sense, socially constructed on the basis of intersubjective understandings and expectations arising out of state interaction. Both identities and interests are “relationship-specific” and are, thus, particular to social contexts (Wendt 1992, 408). This means that coexistence with other actors is fundamental to defining identities and interests. As Wendt (1992, 402) puts it, “actors do not have a self prior to interaction with an other.” More importantly, this further implies that, as identities and interests depend on changing relationships between the self and others, they are always in the making. As such, changes in state practices can develop different structures of identities and interests under international anarchy, whose character can be competitive (Hobbesian), individualistic (Lockean), or cooperative (Kantian) (Wendt 1992; 1999). These social institutions, in turn, reshape state identities and interests; that is, they are mutually constitutive.

Wendtian constructivism, accordingly, offers a perspective that destabilizes rationalist theories as well as fundamental assumptions about International Relations on which these theories are based. “Sovereignty,” for example, “seems to be prior to the kinds of calculations on which rationalistic theory focuses: governments’ strategies assume the principle of sovereignty, and the practice of sovereign statehood, as givens” (Keohane 1988, 391, emphasis in original). However, Wendt (1992, 413) argues that “the sovereign state is an ongoing accomplishment of practice, not a once-and-for-all creation of norms that somehow exist apart from practice.” The principle of sovereignty and sovereign statehood are, in other words, among such institutions that “exis[t] only in virtue of certain intersubjective understandings and expectations; there is no sovereignty without an other” (Wendt 1992, 412). While the principle of sovereignty shapes the behavior of states by defining what it means to be sovereign, it is only out of the practice of sovereign statehood that a certain set of rules develop to govern international relations (Keohane 1988, 385).

Wendt, thus, makes a significant contribution to the discipline of International Relations by problematizing rationalist “reifications” of the world, that is, “treating it as something separate from the practices by which it is produced and sustained” (Wendt 1992, 410). However, Wendt does not essentially challenge the prevailing idea of “states,” whereby states unproblematically exist as the international political agents in Wendt’s constructivist world. Rather, as Cynthia Weber (2009, 62) points out, by explaining that state practices determine the character of anarchy, Wendtian constructivism constitutes the state as “the key decision-maker about the ‘nature’ of international anarchy.” His constructivism, in this respect, allows the state to change its interests and practices, but it “produces the identity of the state as decision-maker, and this identity cannot be changed” (Weber 2009, 62, emphasis in original). After all, as Weber (2009, 80) rightly notes, “Wendt only manages to escape the reification of international anarchy by reifying the state as decision-maker” (emphasis in original).

Weber’s point raises the issue of reifying states as political subjects prior to social interaction. Wendt ignores the processes of constructing states as such, and accordingly, states are “already there,” independent of the social context (Weber 2009, 80). As Jenny Edkins and Veronique Pin-Fat (1999, 1) put it:

Although “identity” is often seen as intersubjectively produced or, in other words, formed through social interaction, what is meant by this is sometimes no more than that a preexisting (but “uncultured” or prelinguistic) subject is socialized into particular cultural settings. In this view, identity then becomes something the subject acquires—and a subject may have many different identities, shifting from one to another either in the course of time or in relation to the different social groups or positions among which the subject may move.

In Wendt’s world, the state (e.g., “Ego”) is already there as a preexisting subject that has an identifiable, pre-social identity and is ready to acquire social identities through interaction with other preexisting subjects (e.g., “Alter”). And “this starting point is presented as innocent, as relatively free of prior assumption” (Zehfuss 2001, 336). Hence, Wendt brackets the very process of “how actors are constituted into self and other in the first place” (S. Smith 2000b, 160). Wendt simply presupposes that the state inherently has such a thing as a state identity, a sense of self, whose definition is changeable.

In fact, Wendt himself makes a distinction between two kinds of identities that states possess: social identities and corporate identities (Reus-Smit 2005, 199-200; Wendt 1999, 224-33). Social identities refer to what Wendt calls “type,” “role,” and “collective” identities that international society ascribes to states. These identities are social to the extent that their construction involves “otherness,” only in relation to which their social types, roles, and collectivity can be defined. On the other hand, corporate identities refer to a sense of collective self that makes states corporate agents or “real actors to which we can legitimately attribute anthropomorphic qualities like desires, beliefs, and intentionality” (Wendt 1999, 197). Corporate identities are constituted by self-organizing internal structures/processes of states, which are exogenous to the states system. As the “constitutive process is self-organizing,” Wendt (1999, 225) contends, the construction of corporate identities requires “no particular Other to which the Self is related.” Therefore, “autogenetic” corporate identities create “(usually) stable platforms for processes of social construction at the international level,” where states acquire social identities (Wendt 2000, 175).

In this context, Wendt (1999, 198) posits that “states are ontologically prior to the states system.” As a matter of fact, Wendt is interested in developing a systemic theory of international relations rather than a theory of state identity formation, and systemic theorists “can theorize about processes of social construction at the level of the states system only if such processes have exogenously given, relatively stable platforms” (Wendt 1999, 198, emphasis in original). After all, Wendt (1999, 244) argues, “we cannot study everything at once.” “The contradiction,” Charlotte Epstein (2010, 331) elegantly clarifies, “lies in his attempt to reconcile a structural, systemic focus that requires positing given units and appraising them from the outside, while emphasizing effects that call into question this given-ness and require opening up these units—which in turn risk undermining his starting point.” “Put differently,” she continues, Wendt “wants to look at a system that has certain pre-givens, but he wants to look at it in such a way as to draw out how these are made by that system, such that they can no longer be treated as ‘givens.’” In this sense, Roxanne Lynne Doty (2000, 139) critically argues that “the truth of the matter is that unitariness must be attributed to ‘the state’ in order for causality, prediction, and positive social science to work. What [Wendt’s] Social Theory demonstrates most forcefully, albeit unintentionally, is that ‘the state’ rather than being an essential entity that has desires, is itself a desire, a desire on the part of international relations scholars to secure our discipline.”

Somewhat ironically, and as an inevitable consequence of his systemic theory in which states are like “people” and exogenously given, Wendt’s constructivism not only makes the domestic political process irrelevant to analyze identity formation and state behavior. But it also makes it impossible to analyze the foreign policy making process within the state. In Wendt’s theory, as Steve Smith (2001a, 50-1) states, “there is no room for decision theory, or groupthink, or bureaucratic politics, or operational codes, or implementation theory. The actors are not the officials who make decisions, or the interest groups or companies, or political parties or military juntas. Rather, the actors are the states-as-persons, and there is no need to look into the black box of the foreign policy process. It is in this sense that foreign policy is what states make it” (emphasis added). Foreign policy in Wendt’s world is merely a state’s response to social interaction with other states, and it is a consequence of the formation of a state’s social identity. State’s subjectivity is, thus, already there, and it must be there in the first place.

Unit-level Constructivism: Overcoming Wendtian Constructivism?

While systemic constructivists focus on the processes of identity construction at the international level, unit-level constructivists draw attention to the domestic processes of identity formation by looking into cultural institutional contexts—norms, in particular—within the state. State actors are socially constructed at different levels, and thus, as Wendt (1999, 21) notes, “a complete theory of state identity needs to have a large domestic component.” The unit-level analysis is, in this respect, expected to fill the gap that Wendtian constructivism leaves, namely domestic self-organizing processes exogenous to the states system (Reus-Smit 2005, 200). The unit-level constructivists, however, seem to share the basic belief with systemic constructivists about identity. In other words, they also presuppose that there is such a thing as a state identity, whose meaning the domestic processes define.

For example, Peter J. Katzenstein (1996a) analyzes Japan’s security policies by examining both regulative and constitutive effects of institutionalized norms and the consequent formation of Japanese collective identity shaping the foreign policy. Here, norms are understood to have two kinds of effects: regulative and constitutive. On the one hand, norms are regulative in the sense that norms serve to regulate the behavior of actors. On the other hand, norms are also constitutive in that they “constitute the identity of actors and shape the standards of appropriate behavior which inform interests and policy” (Katzenstein 1996a, 4). This point suggests that, “as fundamentally social beings, individuals or states cannot be separated from a context of normative meaning which shapes who they are and the possibilities available to them” (Fierke 2007, 170). Based on this understanding of the effects of norms, Katzenstein argues that institutionalized norms have not only directly defined standards of conduct for Japan, but also shaped Japanese collective identity and interests informing Japan’s security policies.

This way, Katzenstein attends to the domestic processes of norm and identity formation. Yet, a closer examination of his definition of identity reveals that he stands in the same place as Wendt. In other words, Katzenstein “explicitly define[s] norms in relation to ‘given’ identities” and thus considers norms as those that define the “characters” of identities that are pre-given (Epstein 2010, 333). For example, when he talks about the constitutive effect of norms, Katzenstein means “to shape” collective identities that are already there and not “to create” collective identities per se. Indeed, he describes identities as “contingent properties of actors” or “label[s] for the varying construction[s] of nationhood and statehood” (Jepperson, Wendt, and Katzenstein 1996, 41, 59; Katzenstein 1996c, 6, emphasis in original). Thus, what is at issue here is “characters” and “variations” of nationhood/statehood and not nationhood/statehood per se (Jepperson, Wendt, and Katzenstein 1996, 60; Katzenstein 1996c, 6). That is to say, social identities rather than corporate identities are rendered problematic, and in order to talk about social identities, corporate identities must be there in the first place so that Katzenstein can theorize about the roles of norms in shaping properties/characters of the Japanese statehood and in formulating its external behavior. In this sense, Katzenstein can unquestionably state that “nations do construct and project collective identities, and states operate as actors” (Jepperson, Wendt, and Katzenstein 1996, 59).

Accordingly, for Katzenstein, Japan’s statehood exists prior to the production and reproduction of its characters, and Japan’s foreign policy is the consequence of the institutionalization of certain norms and the subsequent acquisition of a particular social identity or a character given to the preexisting Japanese state. Although he problematizes a state-as-actor model by examining different forces within the state and challenging the state's unitariness (Katzenstein 1996a, 4), Katzenstein essentially treats identity as something that Japan, preexisting statehood, acquires, maintains, and reproduces through domestic processes.

Many unit-level constructivist analyses share this take on identity (Berger 1998; Katzenstein 1996b; Telhami and Barnett 2002). When they analyze the social construction of states at the domestic level, they actually look at how states are socialized into particular norms and cultural contexts developed within them, whereby the subjectivity of these actors is naturalized, treated as a social fact. Many constructivists, indeed, refer to psychology to explain the formation of identities and their effects on actors' behavior (Greenhill 2008; Kowert 1998). But such arguments make sense only if these actors' "Egos" or pre-social selves are presupposed.

In sum, constructivist research is based on, and requires, the foundational assumption that "the body would hold some true essence of some pre-social self" (Epstein 2010, 332). Consequently, constructivism does not allow us to question this very body or to examine the political enactment of subjectivity per se. At this point, poststructuralism offers alternative approaches to identity, which will provide a useful analytical guideline for the present study. This theoretical tradition gives us a critical perspective on identity that does not essentialize a self. In the following sections, thus, I focus on poststructuralist analyses of identity and foreign policy.

Alternative Ontology of Identity: Poststructuralism

Poststructuralism offers different approaches to state identity by questioning the fundamental idea of state's "I"—the idea that the state has a corporate identity that exists prior to social interaction. Like constructivists, poststructuralists conceptualize identity as social and relational in that identity is constituted through a set of collectively articulated codes and in relation to otherness/an other. However, unlike constructivists, in poststructuralism, identity is also conceptualized as political and discursive. Identity is theorized as a discursive construction, or an effect of political discourse, as an adequate response to which political action or inaction by the self toward the other is called for and legitimated (Hansen 2006). More precisely, treating identity as discursive means that, “rather than understanding subjects as having natural identities, subjects and their various identities might instead be thought of as the effects of citational processes” (Weber 1998, 79)—processes that, by the very representations and expressions of what they are, give things—objects and subjects—meanings and endow them with particular identities. This, however, implies that there is no identity outside discourse, and that identity is a discursive construction generated and sustained through a repeated practice of signification. That is to say, identity is a “fabrication” or an “illusion” that “has no ontological status apart from the various acts which constitute its reality” (Butler 1990, 173).

A conceptualization of identity as discursive and performative makes poststructuralist discourse analysis unique and distinct from constructivist approaches to identity. Instead of assuming what Wendt (1999) calls “essential states” that are self-organizing and capable of acting as corporate agents prior to the social context, poststructuralists examine the discursive construction of identities and its political and ethical outcomes, thereby rendering pre-discursive states problematic. This suggests that, in poststructuralism, de-essentialized selves can no longer “serve as the points of epistemic departure from which theory emerges and politics itself is shaped” (Butler 1990, 164). Insofar as pre-discursive subjects are impossible, the constructivist argument that pre-existing subjects acquire their identities vis-à-vis others and construct the international social structure cannot stand. For poststructuralists, there are no pre-given selves who then identify objects, differences, and others through social interaction or through language as a tool of naming others (Campbell 2007, 217; Doty 1993, 300-5).

The idea that identity is a performative construction, therefore, requires a new way of thinking about selves and others. Because no pre-existing subjectivity is presupposed, the fundamental distinction between them becomes unnatural and problematic. For example, David Campbell (1998, 8) writes:

Identity is an inescapable dimension of being. No body could be without it. Inescapable as it is, identity—whether personal or collective—is not fixed by nature, given by God, or planned by intentional behavior. Rather, identity is constituted in relation to difference. But neither is difference fixed by nature, given by God, or planned by intentional behavior. Difference is constituted in relation to identity. The problematic of identity/difference contains, therefore, no foundations which are prior to, or outside of, its operation. Whether we are talking of “the body” or “the state,” or particular bodies and states, the identity of each is performatively constituted. Moreover, the constitution of identity is achieved through the inscription of boundaries which serve to demarcate an “inside” from an “outside,” a “self” from an “other,” a “domestic” from a “foreign.”

As Campbell notes above, difference is essential to the construction of a political identity because its construction is made possible by demarcating the identity from “what it is not.” Thus, as Campbell (2007, 215) puts it, “the outside is always central to the constitution of the inside; the insane is central to the constitution of what it is to be sane or rational; the criminal is central to the constitution of the law-abiding citizen and the foreign is pivotal in understanding the domestic.” Difference is, however, defined in relation to identity since identity establishes “what it is not.” Identity and difference are, accordingly, simultaneously constituted vis-à-vis each other. Neither can identity nor difference be constituted without the other.

State identity is, in this context, created as an effect of discourse that constructs the state’s self and foreign others by which to inscribe the boundaries between the “inside”/“domestic” and the “outside”/“international.” From this perspective, foreign policy discourse is of fundamental importance to constitute state identity. Integral to foreign policy are “the discursive practices mobilized in presenting and implementing foreign policy” (Hansen 2006, 1). Foreign policy discourses articulate a national self faced with diplomatic problems or security issues with a series of others, and thereby invoke the (ir)responsibility of the self to take appropriate action toward these others. That is to say, by articulating problems and policies to address them, foreign policy discourses construct the national self and the external others, each of whom is given a particular identity that legitimizes proposed policies.

More importantly, this argument indicates that identity is “both constitutive of and a product of foreign policy” (Hansen 2006, 20). More precisely, Lene Hansen (2006, 19) writes:

The conceptualization of foreign policy as a discursive practice implies that policy and identity are seen as ontologically interlinked: it is only through the discursive enactment of foreign policy, or in Judith Butler’s terms “performances,” that identity comes into being, but this identity is at the same time constructed as the legitimation for the policy proposed [...] Identities are thus articulated as the reason why policies should be enacted, but they are also (re)produced through these very policy discourses: they are simultaneously (discursive) foundation and product.

Poststructuralists, thus, argue that identity is ontologically inseparable from foreign policy. As Hansen (2006, 23) notes, “identities are produced, and reproduced, through foreign policy discourse, and there is thus no identity existing prior to and independently of foreign policy.” Therefore, contrary to constructivist arguments, foreign policy is neither what identities shape, nor is it what “follows” identity formation. There are no pre-discursive or pre-social state identities that serve as the secure foundations for implementing foreign policy. For poststructuralism, foreign policy and identity are ontologically interlinked and mutually constitutive. They cannot be causally separated and treated as distinct variables. Foreign policy discourse rather becomes precisely the place where the boundaries between the self and the other are drawn and the identity of the self is secured. Given that identity is performatively constructed in relation to others, foreign policy can be redefined as “one of the boundary-producing practices central to the production and reproduction of the identity in whose name it operates” (Campbell 1992, 75). It is by discursive practices of foreign policy that the formation, production and maintenance of state identity are made possible.

Three Dimensions of Identity: Spatiality, Temporality, and Ethicality

If state identities are constructed by the very representations of these identities, how are selves and others relationally produced by discourse? According to Hansen (2006), foreign policy discourse assigns various “signs” to a self and an other so that the identity of the self is rendered different from that of the other. More precisely, Hansen (2006, 37) explains: “meaning and identity are constructed through a series of signs that are linked to each other to constitute relations of sameness as well as through a differentiation to another series of juxtaposed signs.” “For example,” she notes, “to construct ‘the Balkans’ as different from ‘Europe’ does not create much meaning unless this construction is situated within a discourse that links and differentiates these signs. One discursive possibility is to link ‘the Balkans’ to the violent, irrational, underdeveloped, barbarian, backward, tribal, primitive, and savage and differentiate it against a controlled, rational, developed, civilized, organized, national, orderly, and mature ‘European’ identity” (Hansen 2006, 37).

By assigning a range of signs to construct the self and the other, then, identities acquire three dimensions: spatiality, temporality, and ethicality (Hansen 2006, 41-5). Identity is spatially constructed in the sense that the self is constituted in relation to a territorially localized other. The relational construction serves to create the boundaries between “us” and “them,” thus producing the “internal space” or the “core” of the self distinguished from the “external space” allegedly belonging to the other. It is in this sense that the boundaries delineating the self do not naturally hold themselves and are only “tenuously maintained” in relation to the other (Butler 1990, 170). Identity is also articulated in a temporal manner. The temporality of the self is constructed in relation to the temporality of the other by way of temporal meanings such as developed/underdeveloped, progressive/backward, modern/primitive, and transforming/repetitive. These temporal dualities are relationally assigned to both the self and the other. Furthermore, the conflation of spatial and temporal identities often invokes the responsibility of the self toward the other, thus constructing an ethical identity for the self too. The articulation of ethical identity has grave implications for foreign policy because foreign policy discourse often involves a construction of morality that the self should uphold in carrying out a policy toward the other.

For example, Doty's analysis of US official statements shows how the construction of the United States and the Philippines as particular kinds of subjects made possible US interventionist policy in the Philippines during the Huk Rebellion of the early 1950s (Doty 1993). According to Doty, US foreign policy texts generally described the Philippines as a "child"—immature, guided by passion and emotion, inept, and disordered—needing the guiding influence of the United States (that was conversely identified as rational, ordered, moral, and powerful—like a parent). Presented as "an initiator of action, a formulator of policy, an assessor of situation, and a definer of problems," it would, then, become imperative for the United States to take action in the face of the Filipino rebellion and, most probably, to adopt a counterinsurgency policy through which to give the Philippines proper guidance and control (Doty 1993, 313). Indeed, to do nothing would not be an option as it "would mean the U.S. would abrogate its 'moral position' in the world" (Doty 1993, 315). The direct use of force against the Philippines was not an alternative either because it "would call into question the 'sovereignty' and 'independence' of the Philippines" and thereby problematize "the success of the American 'experiment' that was the Philippines" (Doty 1993, 315). The very representations of fact, thus, create and naturalize certain possibilities and preclude others. As Campbell (1998, ix) writes, "justice is the relationship to the other."

The articulation of these three dimensions of identity offers a convenient framework for the present study on Japan's identity. Indeed, Japan's identity is spatially constructed in relation to its external otherness (such as Asia or the United States), which in turn (re)produces Japan's solidarity and distinctness by defining differences or "foreignness." But it is also temporally secured in a way that, further, enables or impedes certain ethical responses and attitudes. More precisely, Japan has long endeavored to reinvent "postwar Japan" as an identity distinct from past or old Japan, whether it is a reinvention away from a miserable and defeated Japan or from an immoral imperial Japan. As a country responsible for colonizing fellow Asian nations but that also had to face the harsh realities of defeat, Japan has struggled with the contradictory domestic image of its national self as a victim, on the one hand, and with the regional perception of the Japanese nation as an aggressor on the other. Postwar Japan has, thus, tried to produce renewed images of itself by creating discursive boundaries between an "old Japan" and a "new Japan" and, in this process, reinventing past selves as temporal others. That is to say, Japan is reproduced not only as a spatial identity, but also as a temporal construct that is indeed critical in the articulation of a "reborn" pacifist Japan. Therefore, it is important to analyze different dimensions of Japan's self in order to adequately understand Japanese identity politics in the postwar era and to explain its foreign policy as both a foundation for, and a response to, the spatial/temporal/ethical self. In this way, it becomes possible to examine Japanese foreign policy as an ongoing struggle to define the Japanese national self vis-à-vis both spatial and historical others.

Insecurity as an Ontological Necessity?

As suggested above, poststructuralists argue that identities are constructed relationally by assigning opposing signs to a self and an other. While "it is a temptation [emphasis in original] rather than a necessity," William E. Connolly (1991, 8) writes,

“the attempt to establish security of identity for any individual or group” is often made “by defining the other that exposes sore spots in one’s identity as evil or irrational.” More precisely, “a range of differences” are constituted as “intrinsically evil, irrational, abnormal, mad, sick, primitive, monstrous, dangerous, or anarchical,” whereby differences are converted into “threat” or “danger” (Connolly 1991, 8, 65, emphasis in original). According to Connolly (1991, 65), this allows the self to be identified, in turn, “as intrinsically good, coherent, complete or rational.” That is to say, the conversion of difference into opposition, danger, or threat is intrinsic to the construction of the state as a secure, ordered, and rational subject.

In the context of foreign policy, this point indicates the critical importance of the security discourse in which a national self is represented as being confronted with threatening others. David Campbell’s work on the discursive formation of American political identity is of particular note in this respect. On the basis of the poststructuralist conception of states as “unavoidably paradoxical entities that do not possess prediscriptive, stable identities,” Campbell argues that “the state requires discourses of ‘danger’ to provide a new theology of truth about who and what ‘we’ are by highlighting who or what ‘we’ are not, and what ‘we’ have to fear” (Campbell 1992, 11, 54). Campbell (1992; 1994) finds that, in US foreign policy discourses, foreign others, whether communist states or economically developing Japan, are often described as sick, dirty, incapable, irrational, and disordered, thus needing to be rationalized, normalized, moralized, corrected, punished, and disciplined by the United States that is in turn depicted as healthy, capable, rational, and morally superior to such radical others. By constructing dangerous or inferior others and differentiating them from the self, Campbell suggests, the boundaries of the self are inscribed and its identity is produced. It is in this sense that Campbell sees US foreign policy as “a political practice central to the constitution, production, and maintenance of American political identity” (Campbell 1992, 8). Foreign policy is indeed a practice that performatively produces the realm of the “foreign” by identifying and defining danger “outside,” which, in turn, makes possible the secure domestic space “inside” and the constitution of a national self as a political subject. The actual practice of security policy, then, “serves to reproduce the constitution of identity made possible by [discursive practices of] ‘foreign policy’ and to contain challenges to the identity that results” (Campbell 1992, 76, emphasis in original).

More interestingly, Campbell’s argument suggests that there is an interdependent and complementary relationship between identity and danger articulated by foreign policy discourse. That is to say, “insecurities and the objects that suffer from insecurity are mutually constituted” since “insecurity is itself the product of process of identity construction in which the self and the other, or multiple others, are constituted” (Weldes et al. 1999, 10). This point indicates that radical otherness is both a source of insecurity and a condition of possibility for the existence of the state—that is, difference threatens identity and simultaneously constitutes it (Connolly 1991, 66, 67). The dangerous other, therefore, should be there haunting the self so that it can secure the appearance of a “true” identity. Identity is reproduced so long as it is haunted by danger, although this means that the self needs insecurity in order to be. Edkins and Pin-Fat (1991, 1) argue in this sense that identity never achieves self-reliance.

There are no settled identities; the subject never achieves the completion or wholeness toward which it strives. It remains haunted by that which has to be excluded for subjectivity to be constituted in the first place [...] In this picture, the subject is always in the process of being constituted; there is no point at which, however briefly, the performance is finished. [...] The subject only ever will have been. [emphasis in original]

While Campbell posits that danger is an ontological necessity for state identity,² Hansen holds that difference is not necessarily translated as radical or threatening otherness. Rather, Hansen (2006, 6) writes: “constructions of identity can take on different degrees of ‘Otherness,’ ranging from fundamental difference between Self and Other to constructions of less than radical difference.” For example, an other can be constructed as exotic but attractive (Said 1979) or even superior to the self (Neumann 1996). The other may have a potential for transformation and, thus, may eventually become like the self, usually by following the path that the self has taken and/or by getting guidance from the self (Doty 1993; 1996; Escobar 1995). Otherness can also be constructed by “othering” the past of the self. That is, as I will mention in detail in Chapters IV and V, the past self can be constituted as a temporal other (Wæver 1996b). Therefore, as Connolly (1991, 65) suggests, differences can be treated in many different ways—they can be equally translated into “complementary identities, contending identities, negative identities, or nonidentities.”

These subtle but significant nuances in the construction of otherness are critical to foreign policy analysis. Indeed, as I mentioned above, particular representations of ² To clarify, Campbell (1992, 78) notes “a simple contrast need not automatically result in the demonization of the other, and the differentiation or distanciation of one group from another does not require that their relationship be one of the violence.” However, he also argues: “in the context of Foreign Policy, the logic of identity more readily succumbs to the politics of negation and the temptation of otherness.” He continues: “Foreign Policy is concerned with the reproduction of an unstable identity at the level of the state, and the containment of challenges to that identity. In other words, Foreign Policy does not operate in a domain free of entrenched contingencies or resistances. Whichever Foreign Policy practices are implemented, they always have to overcome or neutralize other practices which might instantiate alternative possibilities for identity; and the intensive and extensive nature of the 'internal' and 'external' political contestation that this presupposes means the efficacy of one particular practice will more often than not be sharpened by the representation of danger” (Campbell 1992, 78).

otherness make certain policies taken by a self toward others natural, legitimate, and, thus, possible as reactions to the meanings assigned to these subjects. Different dispositions of meanings produce different political effects by calling for an action or inaction that the self should perform to comply with the produced identity. The action called for can be confrontational or defensive as in the case of otherness interpreted as a national security threat. But foreign policy is not only about a confrontation with radical others. It is also concerned with foreign aid, political integration, alliance, and so on, in which cases otherness does not need to be threatening. The point is that, if we dismiss the possibility of less radical otherness, we cannot adequately address the significance of realms of foreign policy other than security policy as sites that constitute the state. As Hansen (2006, 36-7) holds, “to define a priori that radical forms of identity construction would be the only form of identity construction within foreign policy discourse would result in an unnecessary theoretical and empirical limitation and prevent an engagement with important parts of contemporary foreign policy.” By not limiting the analysis to examinations of relations between the self and threatening others, we can not only look at diverse issues of foreign policy and the performative construction of the state therein, but also examine how different articulations of the self and the other give rise to various possibilities of conducts that the self can take toward the other.

In the context of the present study, others critical in constituting contemporary Japan are not necessarily radical enemy others. Among significant others that construct postwar Japan are the United States, neighboring Asia, and Japan’s own past selves. On the one hand, the United States is the only ally that Japan has had since World War II, and the alliance with it allows Japan to identify itself as “America’s partner.” And yet, Japan has developed ambivalent relations with the United States, which defeated Japan in WWII, occupied it in the immediate postwar years, and still maintains a military presence on Japanese territory (on Okinawa, in particular). Thus, Japan's autonomy is significantly compromised vis-à-vis the United States—a “big brother” whom Japan cannot overcome—and Japan displays a victim identity in relation to this victorious and overwhelming other. On the other hand, Asian others represent an identity that imperial Japan once victimized. Their repeated claims that Japan must readily accept the responsibility toward war victims in Asia confront Japan with an unforgettable history of aggressive wars that imperial Japan initiated. In this way, Asian others represent “victimized others,” in relation to which Japan is identified as a former aggressor, an invader, and a victimizer. These victorious and victimized others, thus, give rise to competing identities for Japan. But both of these others, further, evoke Japan's shameful identities of the past as a miserable loser of WWII and as an international aggressor in Asia. In other words, when dealing with the legacy of World War II, Japan actually faces its past selves that destabilize the contemporary pacifist and respectable identity of Japan.

These others construct critical dimensions of postwar Japan, but they are not necessarily enemy others. Issues at stake between Japan and these others are not only about national security but also about various postwar matters. The analysis of Japan's subjectivity, therefore, demands the examination of relations between the self and various constructions of otherness that can take more forms than radical difference. In order to address these aspects of Japan's identity, we need to consider the possibility of less radical otherness making Japanese political subjectivity feasible.

Women and Foreign Policy

If various degrees of otherness can be articulated to produce a national self through foreign policy discourse, which is now reconceptualized as one of the boundary-producing practices central to the production and reproduction of state identity, it becomes possible to shed new light on diverse foreign policy issues, including those conventionally regarded as unimportant or irrelevant in mainstream foreign policy analysis and IR theory. Issues outside the scope of mainstream analysis can often provide important windows into the constitution, production, and maintenance of an identity. Indeed, poststructuralism shifts our understanding of foreign policy from “a concern of relations between states that take place across ahistorical, frozen, and pregiven boundaries to a concern with the establishment of the boundaries that constitute, at one and the same time, the ‘state’ and ‘the international system’” (Campbell 1992, 69, emphasis in original). This new perspective can bring added meaning to “marginal” issues of foreign policy/international relations too to the extent that they constitute sites for inscribing and re-inscribing the boundaries of a state identity and thus create its conditions of possibility. This redefinition of foreign policy, accordingly, allows us to expand the scope of foreign policy analysis and International Relations and to reexamine overlooked problems from a different point of view.

A theoretical framework that questions boundary-making processes provides especially promising ground for feminist inquiries into foreign policy/International Relations. Generally, women’s issues are not considered one of the core subjects of foreign policy analysis and International Relations (Enloe 1990; Tickner 1997; Tickner and Sjoberg 2007). Many foreign policy issues do concern and affect women (for example, humanitarian intervention conducted under the name of protecting women and children, issues of global poverty that affect women and men differently, etc.). But very rarely are these issues considered to be of high political importance in the field of IR. Indeed, women's issues may not concern vital national interests like issues of peace and security. Further, foreign policy analysis is primarily about relations between states. As such, it supposedly has little to say about women, whose issues are more likely to be relegated to sociological problems or general human concerns (Enloe 1990, 3-4; Tickner 1997, 615-16). Fred Halliday (1991, 159) further states:

There is, however, a more fundamental reason for the gender blindness of most of the field of international relations, namely an assumption of separation between the two spheres of gender and international relations. On the one hand, it is presumed that international relations as such are little if at all affected by issues pertaining to women. To put it in simplistic terms, the assumption is that one can study the course of relations between states without reference to questions of gender. On the other hand, by neglecting the dimension of gender, international relations implicitly supports the thesis that international processes themselves are gender neutral; that is, that they have no effect on the position and role of women in society, and on the relative placement of women and men.

These implicit assumptions (i.e., that international relations can be studied without reference to women and that international processes are gender-neutral) are disputed by feminist scholars who argue that women's roles and experiences are integral to international relations. Feminists hold that international relations are constructed by gender, but in a way that devalues "femininity" and marginalizes women. For example, feminists observe that international politics is constructed as a man's world not only because those who engage in international politics are mostly men, but also because "masculinity" serves as a norm for the international behavior of states (Beckman and D'Amico 1994; Cohn 1987; Elshtain 1997; Grant 1991; Tickner 1991; 1992; 2001). As J.

Ann Tickner (1992, 6) states, “masculinity and politics have a long and close association. Characteristics associated with ‘manliness,’ such as toughness, courage, power, independence, and even physical strength, have, throughout history, been those most valued in the conduct of politics, particularly international politics.” In order to defend and promote national interests, the state is expected to embody these masculine virtues and get rid of such traits as fear, vulnerability, dependence, and irrationality, traits widely associated with “femininity” in masculinist discourses. Men’s/manly behavior is, accordingly, considered to rightly shape world politics, while women’s/womanly roles in politics are rendered secondary and even made invisible in this masculine world.

Contrary to these prevailing assumptions, feminists proclaim that International Relations cannot actually work without “women’s roles in creating and sustaining international politics” (Enloe 1990, 4). Most notably, Cynthia Enloe (1990) argues that International Relations are sustained by a particular power relationship between men and women that makes “the international” “personal.” She explains:

governments depend upon certain kinds of allegedly private relationships in order to conduct their foreign affairs. Governments need more than secrecy and intelligence agencies; they need wives who are willing to provide their diplomatic husbands with unpaid services so those men can develop trusting relationships with other diplomatic husbands. They need not only military hardware, but a steady supply of women’s sexual services to convince their soldiers that they are manly. To operate in the international arena, governments seek other governments’ recognition of their sovereignty; but they also depend on ideas about masculinized dignity and feminine sacrifice to sustain that sense of autonomous nationhood (Enloe 1990, 196-97).

Enloe suggests that women’s issues are not simply “sociological problems” but also “problems of international relations.” And yet, she also notes that “the personal is international” in the sense that how governments conduct their affairs manifests itself in personal power relationships between men and women (Enloe 1990, 196). Katharine H. S. Moon's Sex Among Allies (1997) illustrates this point well. In this work, Moon demonstrates that the relative weakness of the South Korean government vis-à-vis the United States in the early 1970s, when the United States started to review its military strategy in Asia, led to the tighter statist control of prostitution camps around US military bases in South Korea to provide American troops with a better environment and thereby secure the US military commitment to South Korea. In this case, Korean prostitutes were an important instrument of national security policy. In other words, South Korea pursued national security by offering these prostitutes to the US military, thus building its "security" upon the "insecurity" of these women. Moon's study, accordingly, indicates the strong relationship between the personal sexual relations of Korean prostitutes and US troops and the international relations of the entities we know as South Korea and the United States. That is to say, international politics was played at the interpersonal level as a reflection of relations between these states.

These feminist perspectives suggest the importance of seeing women's issues as issues of international politics and foreign policy by breaking down the barriers between "the personal" and "the international." If women's issues are redefined as political, it becomes possible to broaden the analysis of foreign policy to include women's issues and to examine how these issues provide the state with opportunities to performatively constitute its reality. Feminist studies, therefore, suggest the possibility of studying the performative construction of the state by dealing with issues that arise between women/the feminine and men/the masculine. In fact, although foreign policy often demands a foreign other toward which a policy is adopted, otherness can be given rise to not only by a “foreign” state but also by “foreigners,” “foreign” men or “foreign” women. These foreign entities allow the state to discursively construct its “outside” and thereby inscribe the national boundaries delineating the “domestic” and the “foreign” in gendered ways.

Thus, given that the present research focuses on the boundary-producing practices of the state, a particular interest should be given to the roles women play in the construction of the boundaries of a collective self. Accordingly, to explore the relationship between women and boundaries, I would like to turn to feminist works on gender and nation. The feminist works discussed below find that women’s bodies constitute crucial sites for reproducing, as well as disturbing, the boundaries of the national body and identity. It is important to clarify how women’s bodies mark the national boundaries and what kinds of women’s issues are particularly implicated in constructing these boundaries. The following section, thus, introduces broad debates on gender, sexuality, and nation discussed in feminist literatures.

Women and Boundaries

A political community is often represented as a body—a political body or “body politic”—which serves as an instrument, a metaphor, and a symbol through which we make sense of the collectivity (Campbell 1992; Gatens 1996; Gould 2009). As feminists point out, this corporeal representation of the social group is not gender-neutral. Rather, it is a gendered imagination that relies heavily on images of either male or female bodies. For instance, the national body is often called up as a woman or a mother, whereby the motherland is feminized, calling her sons to defend her land, frontiers, and honor (Anand 2008; McClintock 1995; Peterson 1998; Pettman 1996). It is in this context that the invasion of the national land is at times symbolically represented as a “rape,” a metaphor used for the “rape of Belgium,” for example, during World War I, or the “rape of Kuwait” during the Gulf War. V. Spike Peterson (1998, 44) writes:

a nation-as-woman expresses a spatial, embodied femaleness: the land’s fecundity, upon which the people depend, must be protected by defending the body/nation’s boundaries against invasion and violation. But nation-as-woman is also a temporal metaphor: the rape of the body/nation not only violates frontiers but disrupts—by planting alien seed or destroying reproductive viability—the maintenance of the community through time. Also implicit in the patriarchal metaphor is a tacit agreement that men who cannot defend their woman/nation against rape have lost their “claim” to that body, that land.

The other side of this metaphor is that women themselves are the symbolic bearers of the nation, its honor, and its purity (Charles and Hintjens 1998; Kofman 1998; McClintock 1995; Nikolic-Ristanovic 1998; Pettman 1996; True 1993; Yuval-Davis 1997; Yuval-Davis and Anthias 1989). Indeed, women fulfill essential roles in the nation, which Nira Yuval-Davis and Floya Anthias (1989, 7) define in the following terms:

- (a) as biological reproducers of members of ethnic collectivities;
- (b) as reproducers of the boundaries of ethnic/national groups;
- (c) as participating centrally in the ideological reproduction of the collectivity and as transmitters of its culture;
- (d) as signifiers of ethnic/national differences—as a focus and symbol in ideological discourses used in the construction, reproduction and transformation of ethnic/national categories;
- (e) as participants in national, ethnic, economic, political and military struggles.

As suggested by Yuval-Davis and Anthias above, women’s reproductive role is of foremost importance for the nation—women reproduce the nation by giving birth to the future generations and, thus, serve as “nationalist wombs” (Enloe 1990, 54). Women also transmit to children a national culture, thereby preserving the continuity of a national tradition and values. Women are, in this sense, occasionally “represented as the atavistic and authentic body of national tradition [...], embodying nationalism’s conservative principle of continuity” (McClintock 1995, 359). Women are, as it were, the “guardians” of national cultural identity.

Considering such important roles women carry in nationalist processes, a rape by a foreign male has grave implications for the nation. Ruth Seifert (1994, 55) defines rape as “the violent invasion into the interior of one’s body [that] represents the most severe attack imaginable upon the intimate self and the dignity of a human being.” Given women’s symbolic status within the national community, the rape of “our” woman by a “foreign” man is not only a violent invasion into the woman’s body and a humiliation of her own dignity, but it also represents “the symbolic rape of the body of this community,” thus constituting an assault on national identity and honor (Seifert 1994, 64). In fact, rape in wartime is widespread, and it is used not just as a way to humiliate the male opponent as protector of women, but also as a way to destroy the opponent’s culture and the integrity of the group (Niarchos 2006; Mostov 2000, 96; Salzman 2006; Seifert 1994; Sjoberg and Peet 2011). Even in peacetime, international rape occasionally develops into a diplomatic issue, as we will see in Chapter IV. Rape is, in this sense, not so much “an aggressive manifestation of sexuality” as “a sexual manifestation of aggression,” aggression directed toward both women and their group (Seifert 1994, 50).

Yet, obsession with women and the conduct of women’s bodies is not limited to issues of rape but also extends to sexual contact with “foreign bodies” and the by-products of these acts. As Sarah Benton (1998, 34) writes, it is often argued in nationalist ideology that “only pure fluids—blood and semen and rivers—transmit moral purity and racial belonging.” This suggests that great importance is attached to the control of the sexuality of women, whose morality, chasteness, and modesty must be retained for the reproduction of the “pure” nation (Charles and Hintjens 1998; Mayer 2000; Peterson 1998; Pettman 1996; Yuval-Davis 1997). In other words, in nationalist processes, it is “not only that women’s sexual behaviour is circumscribed but also that ‘other’ men must not be allowed sexual access to them; such access not only impugns the honour of the family and community but also sullies the purity of the nation” (Charles and Hintjens 1998, 10). In Bosnia in the 1990s, for example, both the women who became pregnant as a result of rape by Serb males and the children born after the rape were considered to belong to the enemy’s ethnic group (Kaufman and Williams 2007, 17; Nikolic-Ristanovic 1998, 236). Nazi Germany similarly regarded those of mixed Aryan and non-Aryan blood as “contaminated” (Yuval-Davis 1997, 27).

Women, in this sense, present “an entry point for invasion”—that is, they are “vulnerable to seduction, open to physical invasion and contamination, and symbols of territorial vulnerability and national defilement” (Mostov 2000, 92, 98). Yet more importantly, these nationalist discourses suggest that the female body becomes the very site where the national boundaries are reproduced and, at times, disrupted. Women serve as markers of the national boundaries. As such, various struggles to define the national boundaries are played out over the feminine body. Thus, if “our” women are raped or otherwise attacked or defiled, such an act of aggression constitutes an invasion of the self’s national boundaries, the occupation of its symbolic space, and a violation of its autonomy (Mostov 2000, 96). In this sense, “our” women must be protected at all costs by fathers, husbands, sons, as well as by the national state as a whole. And yet, alienating certain women as “foreigners” also serves to reproduce and maintain “our” purity, virtues, and boundaries. It is in this context that women defined as “insiders” or “outsiders” have great implications for the construction of a national self.

This point is of special significance to the present study. If a woman’s body is a symbolic marker of national boundaries, diplomatic issues concerning the body of “our”/“their” women constitute critical sites of foreign policy, wherein the boundaries of a national self are performatively constructed vis-à-vis foreign others. Indeed, international rape is outside the scope of conventional foreign policy analysis and is usually rendered unimportant among foreign policy issues. But, as discussed above, such a “trivial incident” becomes exactly where foreign policy takes place. In this dissertation, to examine the construction of the Japanese national self vis-à-vis the US, Asian others, or Japan’s past self through foreign policy practice, the issues of US military rape in Okinawa and of the comfort women “problem” will be closely analyzed. On the one hand, the comfort women issue is concerned with the Japanese wartime institution of sexual exploitation of numerous women, mostly women from the Japanese-occupied territories, an issue that was raised as a diplomatic matter by South Korea and other Asian states in the early 1990s. On the other hand, rape cases in Okinawa are believed to symbolize the American invasion and humiliation of Okinawa and Japan that are conducted through the bodies of rape victims, thus repeatedly developing into a serious diplomatic problem between Japan and the United States. Each case represents an issue between “our” women and “foreign” men or between “their” women and “our” men, thereby giving rise to discursive boundaries between “us” and “them.” Therefore, this research will show that, by narrating these issues in foreign policy discourses, Japan performatively re-creates its gendered identity in relation to foreign others.

Research Design

To conduct the present research effectively, it is important to have a clear research design. Hansen (2006) provides a useful framework for developing a research design for my project. According to Hansen, to produce a practical research design, one needs to clarify the subject matter and research method in terms of (1) the number of selves (How many subjects are examined?), (2) temporal perspective (Does the research focus on one moment, comparative moments, or historical development?), (3) number of events (How many events are analyzed, one or multiple issue-/time-related events?), and (4) intertextual models (Which texts are analyzed?).

The first dimension of a research design concerns the number of subjects that are studied in the research. One or multiple selves can be studied, and if multiple subjects are chosen, one could examine the discursive construction of these selves responding to the same event or policy issue. Or, the study can also be directed to ask how a self constitutes itself in relation to an other while this very other constitutes itself (or its selfhood) in relation to the self (now the other), a condition Hansen (2006, 68) calls “discursive encounter.” The multiple-selves approach “provides knowledge of the discursive and political room of maneuver of foreign policy issues” since this approach suggests the possibility of dynamic interaction between different representations of identities (Hansen 2006, 68). Alternatively, if a single subject is examined, the research can draw attention to the instability of the self, whose identity not only is contested by competing discourses, but also is transformed according to changes in a dominant discourse. The single-self approach can show that the construction of the self never ends, nor does the self ever achieve singularity.

For the second dimension, a temporal perspective, a researcher can look at one particular moment, multiple points in time, or even centuries of discursive developments. According to Hansen, a single moment study is suitable to conduct a detailed analysis of discourses on a particular incident, while a study of comparative moments or historical developments will allow one to examine discursive changes taking place through a series of events. The value of historical analysis, in part, lies in that “they trace how previously important representations have been silenced and written out of the discourse of the present” (Hansen 2006, 70). In other words, they can show not only dynamic transformation of identities, but also “how deeply rooted particular aspects of current identities are” (Hansen 2006, 70). By contrast, a single moment study can reveal the complexity of discourses, for example, by analyzing multiple selves produced by competing discourses that developed at a particular moment in time.

The third dimension is the number of events. This dimension is closely related to the second dimension; a single moment study can be logically coupled with a single event study and a comparative-moments study with a multiple-events study. Yet, these are not the only options. For a single moment study, for example, one particular event can be picked. But examining two different events happening around the same time is also possible. In fact, by doing so, it becomes possible to “generat[e] knowledge of the discourses of the Self across politically pertinent areas” (Hansen 2006, 71).

Lastly, Hansen suggests three intertextual models of discourse analysis. Model 1 looks into official foreign policy discourse as seen in such texts as speeches, interviews, articles, and books produced by political leaders with official authority. “The goals of a [sic] model 1 study are,” Hansen (2006, 53) clarifies, “to carefully investigate the constructions of identity within official discourse, to analyze the way in which intertextual links stabilize this discourse, and to examine how official discourse encounters criticism.” Model 2 broadens the scope of analysis to consider a wider foreign policy debate in which discourses of oppositional political parties, influential political figures, the media, and corporate institutions such as trade unions, large firms, and powerful NGOs come into play. The second model facilitates the analysis of the discursive hegemony enjoyed by the government while allowing an investigation of the possibility of change in official discourse by showing modifying, challenging, and/or silenced discourses that appear in the wider political debate. Finally, the third model is concerned with widely dispersed representations manifested in “high” and/or “popular” culture (model 3A) or political discourses with a marginal status as they are often seen among academics, social movements, and NGOs (model 3B). Referring to the complementarity of these models, Hansen (2006, 56) notes:

The ambition of discourse analysis is not only to understand official discourse, and the texts and representations which have directly impacted it, but also to analyze how this discourse is presented as legitimate in relation to the larger public and how it is reproduced or contested across the variety of political sites and genres reflected in different ways by models 2 and 3.

Hansen’s research design framework helps to form the basic structure of this research. This dissertation focuses on the formation of Japan’s state identity in the postwar era. Thus, it takes a single-self approach, by which it seeks to problematize the singularity and stability of Japan's identity. Japan's political identity is discursively produced and reproduced in relation to a series of others who secure Japan's subjectivity and simultaneously destabilize it. More precisely, Japan's relationships with Asia and the United States create a crucial condition for the contemporary Japanese self. But, by constructing Japan as both a victim and an aggressor in relation to these others, the Japanese self becomes split between these conflicting identities. Further, contemporary Japan is also constructed vis-à-vis past Japan, either a defeated Japan or an imperial Japan, whose presence allows Japan to acquire a new, "reborn" identity, while also showing the haunting ghost of its own past. In addition, this research reveals the construction of a sub-identity, such as an Okinawan self, which constitutes Japan's whole and at the same time constructs Japan's "internal other." This means that Japan's spatial, temporal, and ethical identity is always contested and unsettled, and that Japan's identity can never achieve stability. The present research, accordingly, draws attention to the competing discourses that are constructing Japan's subjectivity, and explores the possibility of producing a "reborn" identity and overcoming this unsettled identity.

This research also conducts what Hansen would call a comparative-moments study by focusing on multiple events. In Chapter IV, Japan's relations with the United States are explored with a special focus on the issue of US military bases in Okinawa. Okinawa constitutes a site where the boundaries between Japan and the United States are constantly negotiated and reinscribed. The issue of the rape of Okinawan girls by US servicemen is highly politicized and provides an important site of Okinawan/Japanese identity vis-à-vis the US military. The chapter closely examines a highly publicized rape case that occurred in Okinawa in 2008 to analyze how the Japanese self is reproduced by narrating the rape of “our” girl by an American soldier. In Chapter V, Japan’s identity formation vis-à-vis Asia is carefully studied. The focus of this chapter is on the issue of comfort women that was raised as a major diplomatic issue between Japan and neighboring Asian states in the early 1990s. By examining the ongoing debate on this question, the chapter explores how various Japanese selves are constructed through representations of this “historical” issue.

Finally, my dissertation analyzes both official and wider societal discourses about Japanese identity. The texts analyzed include defense white papers (Chapter IV), official government statements (Chapter V), school textbooks (Chapter III), and newspaper editorials (Chapters IV and V). Models 1 and 2 in Hansen’s categorization are thus combined to look at the formation of various Japanese selves in different foreign policy issues.

Through a single-self, comparative-moments study of Japanese identity, this dissertation will ultimately demonstrate that postwar pacifist Japan is a discursive construction that is always haunted by alternative and conflicting images of the Japanese self. In this context, Japan’s increasing investment in global peace and stability can be understood as one form of performance through which Japan creates the reality of the pacifist state and attempts to overcome its unstable and split identity. In its conclusion, this dissertation turns to Japan’s growing commitment to the United Nations’ peacekeeping operations to examine the ongoing performative construction of what we supposedly know as a pacifist Japan, a subject that has learned the evil of war both as a victim and an aggressor, and actively contributes to a better world.

Before turning to the case studies, the next chapter will first look at different approaches to, and analyses of, Japanese foreign policy. It will show how non-poststructuralist analyses have provided explanations for Japanese policy that have in fact constructed what Japan “is.” The next chapter also conducts an analysis of Japanese junior high school textbooks. Such a textual analysis is also meant to show how history is constructed and how historical narratives have constructed “Japan.” It further seeks to explain how historical discourses are not simply a discussion of past situations experienced by Japan. Rather, such discourses are productive of Japan’s past. They perform stories that actively produce the very identity of postwar Japan as the antithesis to wartime Japan.

III. JAPANESE IDENTITY AND FOREIGN POLICY

Japanese foreign policy in the post-World War II era has long attracted the attention of many scholars. Many researchers find that Japan has not played an active role in the international political arena despite the nation's economic power. Indeed, Japan has set limits for its military spending and has been heavily reliant on the military protection provided by the United States. Its leadership role in setting international agendas also seems limited even if Japan's economic power has given it considerable leverage at the negotiating table. Scholars have attempted to explain Japan's reserved foreign policy through different perspectives. As discussed in the previous chapter, since constructivism gained momentum in International Relations, such variables as "identity" and "norms" have been increasingly used to offer new explanations of Japanese foreign policy. Constructivism has raised a set of new research questions, including how Japan's identity shapes its foreign policy, how Japan's national interests are constructed, and whether Japan's identity has changed over time, thus giving a new direction to its foreign policy.

Interestingly, however, until around the time constructivist approaches were developed and employed in the analysis of Japanese foreign policy, attempts to apply conventional International Relations theories to study Japanese foreign policy were not very popular. The studies of Japanese foreign policy had long tended to concentrate on such questions as whether Japan had formulated its foreign policy as a response to American pressure and thus lacked the capacity to develop an independent foreign policy agenda. It is only since the 1990s that more researchers have reevaluated Japan's proactive policy making and referred to existing International Relations theories to explain it (Potter and Sudo 2003; Sudo 2007). The shift occurred partly because of analytical limitations of the Japan-as-a-reactive-state thesis. But it also reflected changing patterns of Japanese foreign policy in the post-Cold War era that many scholars believed required new ways of thinking in order to be fully understood. Indeed, Japan has recently shown initiative in creating various regional institutions outside its bilateral relations with the United States, and has started to participate in UN peacekeeping operations, while also strengthening the ties between the Japanese Self Defense forces and the US military. To explain these new developments in Japanese foreign policy, more scholars have revisited IR theories and tried to offer alternative explanations of Japan's strategic policy making and/or its external behavior. More importantly, by doing so, these scholars have, implicitly or explicitly, recognized Japan's independent agency and thereby regarded Japan as a natural actor/subject of international relations. That is to say, Japan's subjectivity is taken for granted and is even discursively reproduced by their theories.

In this chapter, different theoretical accounts of Japanese foreign policy are examined with a particular focus on constructivist explanations. By critically looking at various constructivist approaches to Japanese foreign policy, I seek to show how constructivists draw attention to the role of identity in Japan's foreign policy making, but in a way that naturalizes Japan's corporate identity. Thus, I also intend to demonstrate how my poststructuralist study of Japanese foreign policy challenges these approaches. After examining constructivist and other theoretical analyses, I will conduct a discourse analysis of Japanese junior high school history textbooks. In doing so, I intend to show how the discourses of Japanese victimhood and Asian victimization, which constitute two basic aspects of Japanese experiences during WWII, have played important roles in constructing postwar Japan's identity. As the first part of this chapter will show, Japan's identity is largely shaped by its unforgettable experiences in WWII. This identity then makes certain foreign policies imaginable and legitimate in Japan while conversely making others unimaginable and illegitimate. From a poststructuralist point of view, however, Japan's identity as a victim of US (nuclear) attacks or as an aggressor in Asia is not natural, but rather discursively constructed. Although Japan's wartime experiences such as the nuclear bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and the Nanjing Massacre are, in a sense, real, the events require interpretations so that particular meanings are given to "fact," "victim," and "assailant."

Among sites where Japan's wartime past is discursively produced are history textbooks used in Japanese schools. In Japan, the government plays an active role in screening and authorizing textbooks, thus exercising administrative pressure over historical narratives. And yet, as a series of textbook controversies mentioned below would suggest, these textbooks constitute a significant discursive space where progressive scholarly accounts of war compete with conservative governmental accounts. Changing textbook narratives, in this sense, can reveal the possibility of different identities about postwar Japan.

To examine how Japan's identity has been constituted through narrating history and how the narratives have changed over time, thus producing different identities for Japan, I will closely read junior high school history textbooks published in the postwar period. Through this analysis, I seek to show the centrality of Japanese victimhood and Asian victimization discourses in Japanese narratives of war. In turn, I want to highlight the significance of the images of victorious US and victimized Asian others in constructing Japan's identity. The chapter will thus provide some analytical foundations for the subsequent chapters that will examine the discursive construction of Japan's identity and policy toward the United States and Asia.

Japanese Foreign Policy and the Reactive State Thesis

In the eyes of many researchers of Japanese foreign policy, Japan's so-called passive role in international affairs, despite its enormous economic power, has been a puzzling question. Postwar Japan has generally followed the Yoshida Doctrine formulated by Prime Minister Shigeru Yoshida in the early 1950s. The doctrine places the highest priority in the economic recovery of postwar Japan, while limiting military spending and making Japan reliant on the US military protection provided by the Japan-US security treaty (Chai 1997; Ikeda 2004; Soeya 2008). Under this doctrine, Japan has long maintained a low profile on security issues and rarely taken a leading role in the international system.

Among popular accounts of this issue is a school that explains Japan's reserved policy as a response to external pressure, and US pressure in particular. According to this school, Japan lacks the capacity to develop a grand geopolitical strategy (Hellmann 1988; A. Tanaka 1989; Yamamoto 1987). Kent E. Calder (1988), for example, argues that the concept of "reactive state" is particularly relevant to postwar Japan because Japan displays two essential characteristics of a reactive state. That is, "(1) the state fails to undertake major independent foreign economic policy initiatives when it has the power and national incentives to do so; and (2) it responds to outside pressures for change, albeit erratically, unsystematically, and often incompletely" (Calder 1988, 519). This thesis is based on Calder's careful analysis of Japan's domestic structure that, he believes, creates obstacles to Japan's proactive foreign policy behavior. More precisely, the fragmentation of Japanese political authority is considered to undermine its capacity to take decisive action, thus giving US pressure paramount importance in Japan's foreign policy making (see also Funabashi 1991/1992; Hellmann 1972, 135-36; R. Orr 1990; Pyle 1992; Richardson 1997).

Others in this school argue that Japan's reactiveness also comes from historical, cultural, and psychological sources—Japan's defeat in World War II and the subsequent occupation increased its sense of vulnerability vis-à-vis American pressure (Berger 1996a; Pyle 1989, 50, 54-6). In Donald C. Hellmann's words, the Japan-US relationship is one of paternalism, "with the United States serving as a kind of political-cultural stepfather" for Japan (Hellmann 1972, 138). Either way, scholars of this school generally argue that Japan does not strategically formulate policies on its own, and that external pressure provides a powerful stimulus to Japan's foreign policy making.

While this thesis is still popular, both those who champion the thesis and those who challenge it have revealed its limitations and weaknesses. Some argue that US pressure cannot fully explain Japanese foreign policy and that Calder's explanation too easily overlooks Japan's domestic negotiations and politics (Cooney 2007; Mikanagi 1996; Schoppa 1997). Others indicate that the thesis neglects the interests that Japan carefully pursues while avoiding risks of all kinds (Levin 1993; Lincoln 2003-2004; Pharr 1993). According to this view, Japan's low profile policy effectively serves Japan's national interests and is well planned to benefit Japan. For example, it has been argued that Japan has a desire to avoid major disruption in its relations with the United States to keep the military protection and export market provided by the United States (Miyashita 1999), and that Japan has strategically played a role as a “supporter” of the existing international order within which Japan still promotes its interests (Inoguchi 1986; Wan 1995). This alternative view, thus, suggests that Japanese “responsive” foreign policy is a strategic “choice” rather than an indication of Japan’s inability to act on its own.

Yet, other scholars argue that Japan has been taking more proactive policy initiatives that are evident in recent Japanese policies with regard to Asian regional institutions, development aid, and UN peacekeeping operations (Laurence 2007; Togo 2003; Yasutomo 1995). William J. Long (2001, 130), for example, contends that “Japan’s use of foreign assistance for [nuclear] nonproliferation is an important exercise of power to set agendas, shape international norms, define Japan’s identity in the international system, and condition the international environment so as to shape other states’ preferences.” Examining Japan’s role in initiating and developing the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC), C. K. Yeung (2001, 138) similarly concludes that “Japan has been carefully nurtured [sic] the idea of creating an economically integrated Asia in accordance to its agenda. Japan’s role in the making of APEC shows the success of its subtle, but persistent, strategy in Southeast Asia.”

Either taking the defensive state thesis or the proactive state thesis, or even taking a stance that combines these theses (Berger 2007; Hirata 2001; Sato 2001), Japan’s more active and independent policy making is increasingly being reevaluated by scholars. As David Potter and Sueo Sudo (2003) recognize, scholars try to characterize Japan’s new diplomatic style in such terms as “karaoke diplomacy” (Inoguchi and Jain 2000), “consensual leadership” (Maswood 2001), “quiet diplomacy,” “aikido state” (Hook et al.

2001), “reluctant realism” (Green 2001), or “indirect leadership” (Blechinger and Legewie 2000). That is to say, when Japan’s foreign policy is found to be strategically formulated, different perspectives and approaches are encouraged to be applied to Japan to explain its international behavior. Indeed, there has been a significant shift in studies of Japan’s foreign policy of late. As Sueo Sudo (2007, 168) notes, attempts to apply IR theories to Japanese foreign policy had been largely absent until the end of Cold War because previous studies tended to stress the “uniqueness” of Japan, thus making it difficult to use conventional theories to explain Japan’s special standing in International Relations (See also A. Tanaka 2000).³ While many researchers still consider Japan an exceptional case (Chai 1997; Tamamoto 1994), the emerging trend has provided incentives to employ realist, liberal, or constructivist theory to account for Japan’s external behavior.

Japan and IR Theories

Japan has achieved remarkable economic development since the 1970s, which has allowed it to become a world economic power. Although structural realists once said that Japan would seek to become a nuclear power and achieve superpower status (Kahn 1970, 165; Waltz 1993, 66-9), against their expectations, Japan has never chosen to develop nuclear weapons. Japan is, accordingly, often regarded as an “anomaly” that “directly challenge[s] realist theory” (Johnson 1993, 203). Indeed, as Chalmers Johnson (1993,

³ Akihiko Tanaka (2000) explains that IR theories have been “imported” to Japan from the West (with some misunderstanding and misinterpretation), but Japanese scholars have been less interested in the so-called “great debates” discussed among Western scholars, and have showed little interest in developing these “imported” theories further in the context of Japan. This situation has made it difficult for Japanese scholars to not only catch up with theoretical trends in Western IR scholarship, but also to contribute to the development of IR theory.

202-3) asserts, “realism does not inquire at all into the domestic responses to and constraints on foreign policies or else assumes that such responses are homogeneous across all states facing similar international pressures.”

Other scholars, however, point to the great relevance of realist premises about power and interests for Japanese foreign policy. Samuel P. Huntington (1993, 72) notes that, “for decades, Japan has acted in a way totally consistent with the ‘realist’ theory of international relations, which holds that international politics is basically anarchic and that to insure their security states act to maximize their power.” Huntington (1993, 72) continues: “Japan has accepted all the assumptions of realism but applied them purely in the economic realm.” Inspired by this argument, Eric Heginbotham and Richard J. Samuels (1998, 171) suggest that Japan follows what they call “mercantile realism” whereby “Japan recognizes technoeconomic security interests—including, but not limited to, those associated with military security—as central considerations of state policy.” More precisely, they argue: “policies designed to enhance the technological and economic fortunes of states may be pursued to increase a state’s political leverage and independence even in the absence of military-security considerations” (Heginbotham and Samuels 1998, 190). Heginbotham and Samuels then develop four propositions applicable to such technoeconomic states. They are:

- (1) Security threats are economic as well as military;
- (2) powerful technoeconomic states will balance against other technoeconomic states;
- (3) when trade-offs must be made, technoeconomic interests may be pursued at the expense of political-military interests; and
- (4) the nationality of firms matters as much as or more than the location of production (Heginbotham and Samuels 1998, 191).

According to this realist view, Japan rationally pursues its interests and acts to maximize its power. Balancing is still a norm for Japan, although it takes place against other technoeconomic powers. In this sense, if power and national interests are defined in technoeconomic terms, realist predictions might still serve to explain Japan's strategic behavior, if structural realism fails to explain it.

Similarly, Tsuyoshi Kawasaki (2001) employs what Stephen Brooks (1997) terms "postclassical realism" to understand Japan's overall strategic goal. According to Kawasaki (1997, 223), Japan's defense policy is consistent with the predictions of postclassical realism that "construes states as actors who, while highly sensitive to the economic costs of defense, are maximizing their security without threatening others in a situation of the security dilemma." The wisdom of postclassical realism, he asserts, explains Japan's foreign policy behavior as primarily designed "to reduce the intensity of the security dilemma in Northeast Asia" (Kawasaki 1997, 223). By maintaining the security alliance with the United States as well as its modest defensive capabilities, Japan has long maintained a favorable international environment without creating a power vacuum and igniting an arms race in the region (Kawasaki 2001, 223-24).

As suggested by these arguments, many realists refer to modified versions of realism to account for Japan's external behavior. Yet many others still employ the traditional realist explanations of balancing and, at times, bandwagoning. Jitsuo Tsuchiyama (1997; 2000), for example, argues that Japan's alliance with the United States reveals Japan's bandwagoning strategy, while Michael Green (2001) contends that post-Cold War Japan mostly balances against rising China.

Such realist thinking is, however, attacked by neoliberal institutionalists who emphasize the roles played by regimes, institutions, and norms. They question whether realists can fully explain, for instance, the maintenance of the Japan-US alliance in the post-Cold War era when the power balance has significantly changed. Neoliberals see the alliance rather as an institution through which Japan and the United States better communicate and increase the predictability and transparency of their relations (Tsuchiyama 1997, 170-73). The alliance, furthermore, serves to govern their relations, advance bilateral diplomacy, and help them coordinate policies. Neoliberalism, accordingly, expects that the alliance will be deepened further in coming years (Tsuchiyama 1997, 173).

If Japan's foreign policy is not one of balancing, as neoliberals suggest, Japanese policy toward China can then be seen from a different point of view too. Mike M. Mochizuki (2007) argues that postwar Japan has long cooperated with China, especially in economic terms. Between 1972, when Japan normalized diplomatic relations with China, and 1989, when the Tiananmen massacre occurred in Beijing, he observes that:

Japan had a keen interest in deepening commercial relations with China. From the beginning of the postwar period, Japanese business and political elites believed that economic complementarity made the two countries natural economic partners and that trade with China would yield commercial benefits. Therefore, the Japanese were quite willing to transgress the Cold War ideological divide in East Asia and separate economics and politics (seikei bunri) to develop trade relations with China (Mochizuki 2007, 746-47).

After the 1989 Tiananmen massacre that roused international criticism of China's assertive domestic policy, Japan's policy shifted toward moderately balancing against China's economic and military rise. However, the policy of engagement was still sustained, whereby “rather than trying to isolate or contain China, Japan has been an active proponent of embedding the country in a variety of global and regional institutions and processes” (Mochizuki 2007, 770). As many other scholars similarly observe, to Japan, engagement with China not only offers economic opportunities, but it also gives the hope that a prosperous China will develop friendly relations with Japan, and thus that increasing interdependence will help mitigate the competition between China and Japan (Howe 1996, 126; Shambaugh 1996, 90). Indeed, despite occasional political tensions, Japan and China have steadily deepened economic relations, which have allowed them to promote economic integration and a complementary relationship (Cheng 2007; Clark 2007).

Neoliberalism, thus, provides a perspective on Japan’s promotion of both bilateral and multilateral institutions, closer economic interaction with Asian states, and development aid through which Japan pursues peaceful and sustainable cooperation with other states. In this neoliberal picture, some argue that Japan has actively played a “supporting” role in the international system led by the United States (Inoguchi 1986; Wan 1995). For example, in his assessment of Japan’s spending strategies, Ming Wan (1995, 93) writes:

Japan has used its spending to subsidize U.S.-sponsored projects and supported the United States in crunch times. Although Japan’s spending is still designed to benefit its earning, there is no evidence that Japan has had serious plans to use its economic power to the detriment of other nations. There is some suspicion that Japan’s ODA [Official Development Assistance] serves its own economic interests at the expense of its competitors, such as the United States, but there is little doubt that Japan’s spending in this aspect is accommodating, at least from the point of view of the recipient countries. Japan’s ODA has facilitated economic growth in East Asia and Southeast Asia [...]. In addition, Japan has been more accommodating in spending for multilateral financial institutions than through bilateral channels. Although Japan has become more assertive in the ADB [Asian Development Bank] and the World Bank in agenda setting than before, it has become less concerned about its immediate economic interests.

Wan argues that, since the 1970s, when the US leadership in the international system was placed in great danger, Japan has recognized its serious interests in maintaining the regimes sustained by the United States, within which interdependence and institutionalization have taken place to change Japan's calculations and definition of national interest. Convinced of the "common interests" of the international community, Japan has become more involved in the international system by supporting the leadership of the United States and by sharing the burden of maintaining the existing regimes. Without understanding the processes of interdependence and institutionalization, Wan argues, we cannot adequately explain why Japan has supported a declining hegemon instead of challenging it or why Japan has taken more accommodating strategies vis-à-vis the United States, Asia, and multilateral institutions.

These arguments developed by realists and liberals may be convincing in some respects. They indeed offer rich insights into Japanese foreign policy by recognizing Japan's independent policy-making capacity and, thus, its agency. That is to say, these theories construct Japan as an international political agent, a corporate actor, which is autonomous, rational, and self-seeking. Japanese foreign policy is, in this sense, Japan's strategy to promote its national interest and to enhance its international environment. For constructivists, however, these analyses are insufficient since they ignore the roles of ideational factors such as norms and identities in Japan's foreign policy making (Katzenstein and Okawra 1993; 2001/2002). For example, constructivists suggest that institutionalized norms not only define standards of conduct for Japan, but also constitute its identity and interests, thus informing Japan's foreign policy options (Katzenstein 1996a; 1996c). Constructivists believe that the variables of identity and norm more successfully explain Japan's alleged "anomalous" international behavior than realism and liberalism, both of which, they claim, easily dismiss the constitutive nature of identity and interests.

Constructivist Accounts of Japan's Foreign Policy

Constructivists seek to explain Japanese foreign policy by raising such questions as how and what kind of identity or norm is formed in/by Japan, and how this identity/norm affects its foreign policy. For example, Thomas U. Berger (1996a; 1996b; 1998) and Peter J. Katzenstein (1996a) discuss the relevance of the sustained norm of antimilitarism to Japan's postwar security policy. They argue that the norm emerged after Japan's defeat in WWII and has since produced Japan's continued reluctance to expand its global military roles and to become a nuclear power despite its increased economic strength and changes in its relative position in the international system. Against a realist prediction that Japan would seek to maximize its relative gains while adjusting its behavior to changes in international power distribution, they assert that cultural factors have shaped, and will continue to shape, Japan's defense policy, thus allowing "no fundamental shift in direction, either toward greater defense autonomy or toward the assumption of a leadership role on security issues in a multilateral context" (Berger 1996b, 345). Instead of developing its military capabilities, Berger (1996b, 336-37) argues, Japan identifies itself as a "merchant nation" that "concentrate[s] on economic development while eschewing the pursuit of military power.” Similarly, Katzenstein (1996a, 18) notes that Japan has developed a collective identity as a “peaceful trading state,” thereby defining its national security in comprehensive terms and pursuing it primarily through non-military means.

Importantly, constructivist analyses draw attention to the meanings given to policies—which are considered legitimate or illegitimate based on a particular understanding of the self. Identity constrains foreign policy while also enabling certain policies to be taken by the self (state). Looked at in this light, Japan’s minimalist security policy is neither an abnormal nor an unreasonable policy choice. It is rather a rational decision based on Japanese culture, institutionalized norms, and/or identity. According to Andrew L. Oros (2008, 5, 193), the security identity of postwar Japan has developed three central tenets—“no traditional armed forces, no use of force by Japan except in self-defense, no Japanese participation in foreign wars”—which have then affected Japan’s security practice “(1) through its influence on policy rhetoric, (2) its structuring of public opinion and the coalition-building opportunities this enables, and (3) its institutionalization into the policy-making process.” Once institutionalized, he argues, security identity “serves as a structure in which all future policy decisions must operate, providing an overarching framework recognized both by top decision makers and by major societal actors under which a state shapes its security practices” (Oros 2008, 9). Therefore, Japan’s security behavior should be understood to be guided by, and constrained within, the context of “domestic antimilitarism,” which is “focusing on limits to the reemergence of militarist elements at home, yet still accepting as legitimate a defensive role for a military at home” and “openly accepting of military activity on the part of other states” (Oros 2008, 6, 5).

In this context, the Japan-US alliance is explained as neither Japan’s strategy to maximize its relative power nor a mechanism to promote the common interests of these states. Rather, it is the result of the “Logic of Appropriateness” (March and Olsen 1989)—i.e., the alliance allows Japan to rely on the United States for military protection, limit Japan’s own military capabilities, and thereby observe its pacifist and antimilitarist norms (Soeya 1998; Tuschiyama 1997, 13-5). Indeed, as Oros argues, the “domestic antimilitarist” identity allows Japan to form an alliance with another state by which to better enhance its security. These arguments tend to stress the continuity of Japanese foreign policy behavior since, once institutionalized, identity and norms constrain Japanese foreign policy and produce some continued patterns. Many constructivist scholars thus argue that Japanese antimilitarist identity can still explain recent changes in Japanese foreign policy. For example, Yoshihide Soeya (1998, 231) finds that postwar Japan has developed a dual identity: “that of a potential great power capable of affecting the international security structure, and that of a self-restraining state.” Soeya maintains that this dual identity has been a source of tension between Japan’s security needs and the antimilitarist norm, and that this tension has long informed Japan’s postwar realism. Although Japanese foreign policy has recently changed in many respects (for example, the increasing commitment to the Japan-US security relationship, regional security, and UN-led peacekeeping operations), he argues that it is “likely to take the form of an expansion of the framework of Japanese postwar realism” reaffirming the value of the alliance and promoting nontraditional security goals for international peace and stability (Soeya 1998, 233). That is to say, Japan's security policy has always been, and will always be, shaped by this dual identity, while its changing security environment, both domestically and internationally, will give rise to different reactions within the confines of postwar realism (see also Oros 2008).

Other constructivists, however, emphasize gradual changes in Japan's identity that could cause policy change. Manabu Ikudame (2004), for instance, defines Japan's security policy as an outcome of the conflict derived from Japan's dual identity, one driving toward a more realistic policy, and the other toward a more pacifist policy. Unlike Soeya, Ikudame (2004, 275) finds that the recent domestic arguments concerning Japan's peace and security concentrate on "how to utilize the Self Defense Forces to contribute to world peace" rather than "if the Constitution recognizes the right of self-defense" or "if Japan should declare unarmed neutrality," questions repeatedly discussed at the beginning of the postwar era. He considers this shift in the defense policy debate as showing the stronger influence of Japan's realist identity and thus as an indication of a change made in the balance between two conflicting identities.

From a different perspective, Kuniko Ashizawa (2008) also studies the recent change in Japanese foreign policy. Japan has recently promoted the establishment of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) and the Association of South East Asian Nations Regional Forum (ARF). However, as she observes, "for more than four decades since the end of World War II, Japan generally shied away from taking political initiatives for regional matters (not least for global matters). It rarely showed interest publicly in the idea of intergovernmental regional institutions in Asia, especially in the security realm, having appeared quite comfortable with its exclusive reliance on bilateral diplomatic dealings with regional countries and with the United States” (Ashizawa 2008, 585). Ashizawa attempts to answer this question by focusing on state identity and values that shaped Japanese policymakers’ preference for participating in pan-regional frameworks. By interviewing governmental officials and closely reading official and unofficial documents, Ashizawa finds two basic values shared among Japanese policymakers: “reassuring Asian countries about Japan’s activism,” and “keeping the US in Asia” (Ashizawa 2008, 585). On the one hand, the policymakers’ conception of Japan as “a one-time aggressor in Asia” constitutes the idea that Japan “should not arouse Asian neighbors’ fears about the possibility of Japan’s resurgence as a dominant power, political and militarily, in the region,” and thereby defines Japan’s preference for “cooperative” and “less hierarchical” multilateral approaches (Ashizawa 2008, 585). On the other hand, although Japan has long debated whether it should identify itself with the West or Asia, a new identity, that of “a sole member of the West in Asia” (which identifies Japan with both the West and Asia) has been emerging, thus encouraging Japan to secure the US involvement in Asia to reproduce this identity. Institutions such as the APEC and the ARF have been given added meaning in this context, and Japanese policymakers have started to pursue this new policy option.

Interestingly, these latter arguments tend to stress the changing environment of Japan as well as its evolving relationships with other states. Indeed, if identity is conceptualized as being developed in relation to other entities rather than being derived from historical experiences, Japan’s changing interactions with other states are likely to produce a change in Japan’s identity and, further, in its foreign policy. This point is evident in the analyses of Japanese foreign policy discourse that examine how Japan is represented vis-à-vis other states. There are a few studies on Japan's foreign policy discourse conducted in a constructivist manner. Isao Miyaoka's study is of particular note. By closely reading Japan's defense white papers published between 1976 and 2006, Miyaoka (2009) finds four types of identities that repeatedly appeared in the white papers: a "member of the West," an "economic power," a "peaceful state," and a "US ally." During the Cold War, white papers frequently represented Japan as a "member of the West" and an "economic power," whereby the need to reinforce Japan's defensive power was emphasized. To maintain relationships of mutual trust with other Western states and to defend Japan from the "threat" of the Soviet Bloc, it was pointed out that Japan should improve its military capabilities and make active international contributions for the sake of world peace, using its abundant wealth.

However, in the post-Cold War discourse, the alliance with the United States is emphasized, replacing the identity as a "member of the West." Indeed, the Japan-US alliance has further evolved since the 1990s. The Japanese Self Defense Forces now work more closely with the US military. Interestingly, Miyaoka observes that this change was made possible not only by the end of Cold War, but also by reshaping the meaning of "pacifism." More precisely, although Japan's longstanding "peaceful state" identity had rejected Japan's self-identification as a military ally of the United States, Japan started to publicly call itself a "US ally" and to cooperate with this "partner" in the sphere of regional and international security by reinterpreting pacifism and defining it as a goal that should be achieved more actively rather than passively by refraining from using its military power abroad.

Miyaoka's study is informative and illuminating. Especially, Miyaoka successfully shows how the meaning of pacifism has been changing, a perspective not adequately addressed by Berger, Katzenstein, Oros, or Ikudame, for example. But there is also a pitfall to Miyaoka's study. For Miyaoka, discourses are simply the reflections of identity and thus only a tool for an actor to represent "who it is" in relation to other states. That is to say, discourses are merely "data" useful for researchers to study the continuity and transformation of Japan's state identity. It is accordingly presumed that an objective reality exists outside discourse. The presumption is shared by other scholars who study Japanese foreign policy discourse (Ashizawa 2008; Oga 2003). For them, a pacifist Japan is "out there." Although these constructivists introduce the idea that Japan is not only an international agent, but also a social actor whose sense of self is greatly relevant to its foreign policy, what is at stake here is which identity persists or transforms into another identity within the fixed and naturalized entity called Japan.

Japan as a Discursive Construction

As suggested in Chapter II, since corporate identity is not a relevant question in constructivist analyses, constructivist scholars would rather examine how a particular social identity has emerged in Japan. For instance, many constructivists ask how a pacifist Japan was constructed in the postwar era. Many consider the Japanese experience during WWII to be a key source of Japan's pacifist identity. Interestingly, however, Japan's antimilitarist culture was not salient right after WWII. In the early 1950s, opinion polls showed that the majority of Japanese people were in favor of Japan's rearmament and the revision of the pacifist Constitution (Miyashita 2007, 108-9). Even in 1955, more than 20% of Japanese people favored the acquisition of nuclear weapons, and the number more than doubled by 1981 (Miyashita 2007, 109). This means that “the pacifist orientation was weaker in the immediate postwar years than the subsequent decades,” even though memories of WWII were still fresh and vivid among Japanese people (Miyashita 2007, 109).

Researchers provide various accounts of the rise of an antimilitarist norm/identity in Japan, which can be explained, for example, as the outcome of domestic political conflicts and the institutionalization of the winning norms (Katzenstein 1996a), as the result of the American occupation and the subsequent rise of new Japanese democratic elites (Berger 1996b;1996c), or as the consequence of the lower level of threat perception and the reduced sense of insecurity among Japanese people (Miyashita 2007). Both domestic and international contexts would be indeed relevant to the construction of Japan’s postwar pacifism (Oros 2008).

While different factors can be found inside and outside of Japan, it should be stressed that Japan’s pacifist identity is not automatic but constructed. The emergence of a pacifist state is not the natural consequence of a bitter experience in WWII. Indeed, from a poststructuralist point of view, “postwar Japan” is a discursive construction whose meaning needs to be articulated and rearticulated by representing “who we are” in relation to others, such as the victorious United States, victimized Asia, or even Japan’s own militarist past. When particular meanings are assigned to a self and to others, World War II can be remembered as a “horrible event,” as a “tragedy,” and “historical lessons” can be drawn from it. Further, we would need to ask how such a meaning (e.g., pacifist) has been made and attributed to “Japan.” As Chapter II has suggested, language plays an important role in producing what is discussed. The very representations of what Japan is give “Japan” meaning and endow it with a particular identity. Japan can, thus, be understood as an effect of discourse—a performance that produces and reproduces the identity in whose name it operates.

In the rest of Chapter III, I examine how “postwar Japan” has been produced as a particular kind of subject in discourse. Being aware of the performative nature of language, I particularly focus on how the Japanese experience of WWII has been narrated. The narration of WWII is indeed integral to the myth of “postwar Japan.” The end of WWII gave birth to “postwar Japan,” and thus “wartime Japan” serves as a significant other that constitutes what postwar Japan is not (or not supposed to be). To best analyze the narration of Japanese history, I closely read history textbooks used in Japanese junior high schools. As the highest level of mandatory education, teaching at junior high schools offers rich accounts of Japanese history. I first summarize history education in Japan and describe a series of textbook controversies that occurred after World War II.

History Textbooks and the Discursive Construction of Postwar Japan

History textbooks are one of those sites where “postwar Japan” is constituted by discourse. Indeed, history textbooks provide various accounts of how Japan emerged after the great tragedy of WWII, accounts presented to Japanese students as a part of a compulsory education. With regard to the importance of history education, Alexander Bukh (2007, 687) writes:

history taught at schools is conceptualized as providing students not only with dry facts regarding past events but also with what has been defined in the study of national identity formation as a “historical narrative.” In contrast to “history” which contains only facts and dates, a “historical narrative” provides broad interpretations of the national past and links to the present. As such, it constitutes a cognitive lens that helps members of a national community make sense of the nation’s place in the world and serves as an important tool in the construction, re-construction, and contestation of national identity.

The Japanese government has long played an important part in history education. The government exercised its influence by designing curriculum guidelines and authorizing, and at times creating, school textbooks (Caiger 1968). As a result, while history textbooks reflect broad academic and societal debates about how to narrate Japanese national history, the Japanese government also plays a large part in the production of a “historical narrative” or an account of “what Japan was” and “how Japan has become what it is today.”

Due to the enormous importance given to history education, however, the screening of history textbooks has occasionally given rise to considerable controversy. Critics argue that textbook certification constitutes a form of censorship. Teruhisa Horio (1988, 16) notes: “Even though the Ministry of Education has tried to represent this system as a neutral attempt to eliminate politically biased opinions, or as scientifically objective efforts to correct mistaken information, it in fact constitutes nothing less than an attempt to keep out of our schools all ideas which do not fit in with the State’s view of the kinds of knowledge which are both appropriate and desirable to administer to Japanese youth.” In fact, the Ministry, at times, expressed an opinion that Japan’s expansion into Asia in the past should be described as “advance” rather than “invasion,” while the authorization of a history textbook written by a nationalist group, Atarashii Rekishi Kyokasho wo Tsukuru Kai (the Society for the Creation of New History Textbooks), in 2001 called into question the Ministry's "unbiased" view of history. Against this background, Ienaga Saburo, a history professor and a writer of history textbooks, filed a lawsuit against the government in 1965 upon the rejection of his progressive history textbook by the Ministry. He argued that the governmental screening system violated the Constitution's guarantees of freedom of expression and thus constituted an abuse of power (Buruma 1994, 189-201; Horio 1988, 177-80; Nozaki and Inokuchi 2000). After a long battle, the screening was deemed constitutional, although the Supreme Court ruled that the Ministry's demand for the deletion of descriptions about Japan's wartime atrocities was illegal. Some scholars indicate that history textbooks constitute a site where ideological conflicts are fought between the "progressive academic establishment" and the "conservative bureaucratic and political establishment" (Bukh 2007, 684; J. Orr 2001, 72).

Given ideological splits among academics, the conflicts over historical narratives are much more complicated. While many textbooks offer critical perspectives on Japan's expansionist policy leading to World War II, conservative texts, as represented by the Tsukuru Kai's textbooks, advance a more radical view by glorifying people's sacrifices for the country. The Tsukuru Kai is well funded and strongly supported by conservative scholars and politicians, although the use of its textbooks is very limited, with less than 1% of Japanese junior high school students actually using them (Bukh 2007, 686; Jeans 2005, 186, 192; Nozaki 2005, 298; Uesugi 2005). It is also important to note that historical narratives presented in history textbooks in general have changed over time. The discourses produced in these history texts are never static, but occasionally revised by new discourses. For example, in 1982, the "neighboring countries clause" was introduced in the screening of history textbooks, whereby the Ministry of Education encouraged textbook writers to display sensitivity toward the feelings of Asian people when depicting Japan's history of Asian victimization. As a result, history textbooks written after this time increased their references to Japanese aggression against neighboring states, including the enslaving of comfort women, the mass slaughter in Nanjing (the Nanjing Massacre), and the use of forced labor throughout Asia (Bukh 2007; Jeans 2005, 184-86; Nozaki 2005, 285-88). The progressive move, however, caused a nationalist backlash in the late 1990s, and references to comfort women, for instance, were significantly reduced in the 2002 editions of textbooks. They disappeared from all junior high school texts in 2012.

Nevertheless, studies on history textbooks show that there has been some coherence among the textbooks, often exhibiting similar patterns of representation of Japanese history (Barnard 2003; Bukh 2007; J. Orr 2001). It is largely because much importance is attached to "construct[ing] a clear demarcation between the pre-1945 and post-1945 Japan" that it is possible to "separate the 'polluted' past from the new present, as a springboard to construct a new narrative of postwar Japan" (Shimazu 2003, 101). This results in the textbooks' heavy emphasis on the wartime "victimization" of Japanese people by the military clique, on the one hand, and the portrayal of postwar Japan as a peaceful state having overcome its past militarism, on the other. That is to say, "the victimhood of the Japanese people serves [...] as a 'foundational myth' of postwar Japan's pacifist identity," while it inevitably "creates a highly critical view of the state and its militaristic policies" (Bukh 2007, 691). Although descriptions of victimization of Asia by wartime Japan have varied across time, the discourse of Japanese victimhood has long been central to historical narratives. This underlying theme, then, provides continuity between different textbooks despite constant revisions made in the texts.

In the following sections, I will analyze how “postwar Japan” is discursively constructed by closely reading history textbooks used in Japanese junior high schools in the postwar era. As mentioned above, Japan’s antimilitarist culture was weak in the early 1950s, but was deeply embedded in Japanese society by the 1960s. Given that history textbooks constitute an important site where discourses over Japan’s identity are produced and reproduced, and that the textbook descriptions of Japanese history change over time, it is important to examine how the textbook narratives of WWII have changed since the early postwar period. Therefore, the section conducts a comparative textual analysis of textbooks used in the early 1950s, the mid 1960s, and further the late 1990s and the early 2000s. To note, the analysis places a special emphasis on the descriptions of Japanese victimhood and Asian victimization in the textbooks. The narratives of Japanese victimhood and Asian victimization are of fundamental importance not only because they are two key aspects of Japanese experiences in WWII, but also because they constitute two key dimensions of Japan’s identity that, as the following chapters will explain, have grave implications for Japan’s postwar diplomacy. In the end, this analysis will suggest that postwar Japan is discursively constructed around two conflicting identities, that of an aggressor and that of a victim, and that Japan’s victim—“Asia”—and the conqueror of Japan—“the United States”—constitute “significant others” that give “postwar Japan” a particular meaning. The present chapter then provides analytical foundations for the subsequent chapters that will examine Japan’s relations with Asia and the United States through which Japan performatively produces its identity while dealing with the legacy of its past.

History Textbooks in the Early 1950s

From the beginning of the Allied occupation of Japan, education was considered fundamental to Japan's reconstruction and the creation of a "peace-loving nation." Under the Allied authority, new textbooks were produced to provide what could be called "peace education" for Japanese students and, thereby, to rehabilitate the nation as a peaceful one. Among these new textbooks were history books that offered a new narrative of Japan's past and future. According to James J. Orr (2001, 72), "occupation-era texts established two perennial themes" in the new history education: "the people had been forced or duped by their militarist leaders into cooperating with the war effort; science and culture were the proper realms in which Japan could contribute to the postwar international community." Clearly, underlying this narrative was the Allied assumption that "the root of Japanese aggression lay in the people's servile habits of thought that made them so susceptible to such manipulation" (J. Orr 2001, 75). The Allied educational policy thus primarily aimed to raise people's awareness of this "root cause" and to reproduce Japan as a reborn pacifist state.

Reflecting this Allied policy, history textbooks published in the early 1950s display critical views about the Japanese military. All analyzed textbooks provide clear descriptions of the belligerence of the Japanese military clique and attribute to it the occurrence of the Manchurian Incident (1931) and the subsequent outbreak of the Sino-

Japanese War (1937) and of the Pacific War (1941).⁴ More precisely, these textbooks explain that militarists achieved greater political power by brutally assassinating influential politicians, including Prime Minister Inukai Tsuyoshi (1932), enacting the National General Mobilization Act to mobilize all available resources to go to war (1938), and disbanding political parties to oppress their opponents (1940). The military clique is also blamed for having ignored governmental efforts to put an end to armed clashes in China through diplomatic means and having escalated the battle to drive Japan into an aggressive war.

The indication of the critical role played by the military clique to start the disastrous war accordingly separates the militarists from the people who suffered from the imposition of militaristic ideas and the deprivation of freedom of speech. The people's complicity is clearly denied by such descriptions as they "hated the despotism of the military" (Kodama et al. 1952, 220) and "hoped for peace" (Ozawa and Sano 1952, 188). The military, thus, brought the people suffering not only by promoting an expansionist policy, but also by controlling every aspect of society—the economy, finance, transportation, labor, and even food distribution. These descriptions of military control of the people further increased in the 1955 textbooks, becoming more concrete than in the 1952 texts. For example, some of the 1955 texts say that the people were not only deprived of their freedom, but were also persecuted if they dared to criticize the military clique. Most men, including students, were drafted into the army, and even women and the underage were mobilized for war efforts. In schools too militarism became more salient to reinforce the military regime and to promote nationalism.

⁴ The texts analyzed include: the 1952 texts published by Gakko Tosho, Nihon Shoseki, and Shimizu Shoten; and the 1955 texts by Gakko Tosho, Nihon Shoseki, Shimizu Shoin, Teikoku Shoin, and Tokyo Shoseki.

Accordingly, the victimhood of the Japanese people constitutes a central theme in the textbooks' narrative, and it is constructed in relation to the military clique rather than to the victor of the war—the United States. Although many of the textbooks mention that some people initially supported the military because the government was corrupt and incapable of dealing with economic and social instability, or that the popular dissatisfaction with the government indirectly helped the militarists to increase their influence, people are generally depicted as vulnerable victims of militarism and of the war it initiated. The role played by the United States in victimizing the Japanese people is, therefore, rendered secondary, only reinforcing their victimhood established vis-à-vis the Japanese military. These textbooks only briefly mention US aerial strikes, the dropping of atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and the occupation of Okinawa to show the weakening position of Japanese forces rather than to explain the harm to people caused by the United States. Thus, although these textbooks occasionally insert a photo depicting Tokyo or Osaka burned as a result of US bombings, these photos serve to evoke the image of the miserable end of militarism and not of the US devastation of Japan. That is to say, the real enemy for Japanese people was not the United States, but the Japanese militarists. Indeed, some textbooks note that the United States initially sought peace with Japan, an option Japan turned down by itself.

As the narrative centers on Japanese victimhood vis-à-vis the militarists, Japanese atrocities in Asia remain peripheral, only serving to stress the brutality of the Japanese military. The textbooks simply say that the Japanese military “advanced into”

and “occupied” China and South Asia where they faced intense opposition from the local people. The centrality of Japanese victimhood does not leave much room for other “victims” to be recognized, and China and other Asian nations are depicted not so much as victims of Japanese military violence, but rather as “brave fighters” who strenuously fought against Japanese interference. The textbooks state that the Chinese “went all out to stand up against the Japanese military” (Abe and Katsuta 1955, 227), “fought well” (Nakayama et al. 1955, 118), and “never dared to give in” (Mori et al. 1955, 227). Indeed, China (or its national government) tends to be represented as a rational actor who had long tried to unite the country and, in the face of the Japanese invasion, appealed to the League of Nations to stop the Japanese.

In this sense, the end of the Pacific War, first and foremost, marked the “liberation” of the Japanese people from the military authority and from the suffering of a 14-year war. Although the Pacific War itself was a tragic event, its end made it possible for the nation to make a historic step toward building a “new Japan”—“a democratic, peaceful, and cultured state” sincerely hoping to create world peace (Ozawa and Sano 1952, 204). These textbooks, accordingly, emphasize the dramatic transformation of Japan from a militarist state into a people’s state, thereby creating the boundaries between an old militaristic Japan and a new pacifist Japan. “Determined to become a pacifist state,” they further explain, Japan “denounces war” and “leads the world by totally giving up military capabilities” (Kodama et al. 1952, 235). Interestingly, some textbooks indicate that pacifist and democratic ideals have a long history in Japan, and are not new to the Japanese tradition (Abe and Katsuta 1955, 242; Nakayama et al. 1955, 150). Therefore, they argue that the new Japanese Constitution drafted by the Allies was not “imposed” on the Japanese people, who are by nature peace loving and now form the foundation of a new pacifist state. That is to say, a new Japan was not started by foreigners, but by the peace-loving Japanese people themselves.

It is important to note here that Japan's postwar pacifism as described in these texts stands in relation to its tragic experience during the war that was brought about by its own military. As one of the texts states, it was "due to extreme statism and militarism [that] we have suffered the unprecedentedly miserable fate" (Mori et al. 1955, 258). Thus, it is imperative that postwar Japan must not only compensate for damages it caused abroad, but also change its political system never to allow militarists to gain power in Japan again. History education was clearly an integral part of the Allied rehabilitation policy aiming at Japan's demilitarization and democratization.

Textbooks in 1966

From the late 1950s onwards, and in response to the publication of progressive history textbooks and to changes in domestic and international situations, the Ministry of Education enforced stricter policies for textbook screening, and thereby reasserted the tighter control of textbook history narratives (Nozaki 2005, 277-81, 283-84; Nozaki and Inokuchi 2000, 104-7; J. Orr 2001, 72-3, 89-90). Many textbooks were rejected or ordered to be revised for their "too progressive" representations of history. It was against this background that Ienaga Saburo filed a series of lawsuits against the Ministry to question the legitimacy of the textbook authorization procedures.

The reemergence of a nationalist orientation in the Ministry essentially resulted from the wartime governing structure having been left intact during the occupation period.

More precisely, “occupation forces chose to use this established governing structure as the instrument for democratizing the nation and its education system, thus creating a fundamental contradiction within the reform process” (Nozaki 2005, 275). The United States also prioritized making an anti-communist front over reforms in the Japanese educational system. As such, wartime political and educational leaders were hardly replaced, and they reasserted their influence after the occupation ended.

That being said, there was still strong resistance to the conservative forces. Such events as the 1955 Bandung Conference and the rise of an anti-nuclear movement in Japan (that developed as a reaction to US nuclear testing in Bikini Atoll exposing a Japanese fishing boat to the fallout) encouraged a critical attitude toward Japan’s wartime expansionism and further promoted pacifism (J. Orr 2001, 73). Therefore, while there were growing political and administrative pressures, the basic discourse seen in the textbooks of the early 1950s did not radically change in the 1960s. Among those textbooks issued in 1966, five textbooks are examined for this analysis.⁵ All of these textbooks critically view the role played by the military clique in dragging Japan into war and bringing considerable suffering to people inside and outside Japan.

There are, however, two notable changes displayed in these newer books: more detailed descriptions of suffering by Japanese people, and increased references to Asian opposition to the Japanese military. First, the 1966 versions continue to increase the descriptions of strict military control of people’s life and the erosion of freedoms by adding a section entitled “war and people’s life” or “preparations for war in a totalitarian state.” In this section, the textbooks provide richer depictions of how the militarist government exploited people to carry on the war by detailing their harsh experiences such as the lack of daily commodities and their increasing reliance on the distribution of food, clothes, and other essential goods. People's changing living conditions are illustrated with pictures that display children and young male and female students—ideal images of vulnerable war victims—drafted into the army and for labor, trained to rescue the injured in air raids, and evacuating to countryside to take refuge from American aerial bombings.

⁵ The textbooks analyzed are those published by Gakko Tosho, Nihon Shoseki, Shimizu Shoin, Teikoku Shoin, and Tokyo Shoseki.

Under the “people and war” section are also references to US air strikes on major Japanese cities. Interestingly, instead of regarding these attacks as showing the strategic disadvantages of Japan as was seen in the previous editions, these textbooks now explain that the air strikes burned down many cities, produced numerous casualties, and thus contributed to the greater suffering of Japanese people. As a result, these US attacks are juxtaposed with the Japanese military control of the people, whereby the United States is construed as yet another perpetrator who victimized the Japanese civilian population.

This narrative gives new meaning to the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki as well. Although the dropping of these bombs was previously mentioned merely as a series of events that had happened toward the end of WWII, it is now stressed that those bombings resulted in the total destruction of two major Japanese cities and the massive killing of Japanese civilians. Many textbooks now insert a picture of devastated Hiroshima with a note that the atomic bomb instantaneously destroyed Hiroshima and slaughtered many people. The narrative attaches a deep significance to Japanese pacifism. In other words, the atomic bombings create a new source of Japanese pacifism, endowing Japan with a special pacifist mission as the world's first and sole victim of nuclear bombings (J. Orr 2001, 86-9). “As the only state atom-bombed in the world,” the Teikoku Shoin textbook states, “it is our strong hope to realize world peace” (Nishida and Suzuki 1966, 301). In this context, this textbook concludes that “the nuclear weapons terminated the war, but they simultaneously started a postwar peace movement” (Nishida and Suzuki 1966, 299). Japan’s elevated position in the international community, demonstrated by its admission to the United Nations in 1956 and its growing economic capability, is also considered to further increase Japan’s “responsibility” and “capacity” to work for world peace. Japan’s distinct identity as a pacifist state, thus, emerges not only from its miserable experience brought by the Japanese military, but also from its unique experience with atomic bombings.

As for the Asian victimization discourse, although the “brave fighter” narrative still remains, the greater recognition of the evilness of the Japanese military vis-à-vis pitiable Japanese citizens allows Asian nations to be perceived as “fellow victims” of Japanese militarism. In some textbooks, there are slightly more references to opposition from Chinese and other Asian people to the Japanese invasion, and some even mention aggressive Japanese military acts in Asia. The Nihon Shoseki textbook, for example, adds a footnote about the Manchurian Incident, clearly indicating that the incident was started by the bombing of a Japanese-owned South Manchurian Railway train by the Japanese military, which then held the Chinese responsible for the incident to make up a reason to attack China (Abe et al. 1966, 281). The Nihon Shoseki textbook also explains that not only Japanese students but also Koreans were conscripted to solve a labor shortage in Japan, a reference that never appeared in its 1952 and 1955 editions (Abe et al. 1966, 289). Further, in the Tokyo Shoseki texts, “the Great East Asia Co-prosperity Sphere” propaganda used by the Japanese military is explained as a concept elaborated with a clear desire to “dominate Asia” (Kiuchi et al. 1966, 295n3).

These references subtly suggest the aggressive and selfish nature of Japanese military acts, although Japanese atrocities in Asia are not yet made explicit. Indeed, these descriptions do not fundamentally change the dominance of the narrative of Japanese victimhood, whereby Japanese suffering rather than Asian suffering remains central to the textbook narrative. Thus, the Japanese people’s culpability for this aggressive war is, if there is any, unclear. It is stated that many supported the war, and the Nihon Shoseki text even mentions that, “when the war started, a spate of reports about victories in battles roused people to go to the front and strive for home-front production” (Abe et al. 1966, 289). Still, the government not only “hid the truth” about Japan’s losses, but also “deprived the people of freedom of speech.” The Japanese people were, after all, exploited and manipulated into fighting the war. They are thus “presented as somewhat lacking in agency to resist the militarists’ proactive policies” (J. Orr 2001, 87). The substantial representations of their controlled life, rather, serve to attribute Japanese misdeeds in Asia to the military only and to maintain the distinction between the military and the people.

In sum, in the early postwar era, the textbooks displayed a strong Japanese victimhood discourse that not only constituted a victim identity about the Japanese people, but also provided a firm foundation for Japan’s postwar pacifism. As a state that experienced a tragic war and even atomic bombings, postwar Japan was endowed with a special pacifist mission and destined to contribute to world peace. While Japanese victimhood is primarily discussed in relation to the Japanese military (thus, the victimhood is confined to the people), the emerging narrative gives rise to the United States as a victorious, but possibly cruel, foreign other. This also creates the possibility that Japan's victim identity (the sole atomic-bombed state in the world) may be constituted in relation to its victimizer state. In other words, Japanese victimhood could be reconstituted in the context of a state-versus-state structure and thus be extended to the Japanese state as a whole. The Asian victimization discourse was, on the other hand, still very limited. Even if selfish and (to some extent) aggressive Japanese military acts in Asia were attributable to the Japanese military, the Japanese people were scarcely held accountable for not stopping their military. Japanese pacifism, in this sense, stands by the "innocence" and "victimhood" of the Japanese people who make it possible to reconstruct Japan and give it a new pacifist identity. This way, the "formerly victimized Japanese nation" could serve as the "foundational myth" of a peaceful and democratic Japan, opening a new chapter in Japanese history.

1997 Textbooks

In 1982, a debate over a history textbooks resulted in a significant shift in the Ministry of Education's screening policy and made textbook publishers more attentive to the Japanese history of victimizing neighboring Asia. The news report that the Ministry forced the replacement of the term (Japanese) "invasion" with "advancement" during the history textbook authorization process (the news was later found out to be inaccurate) invited strong protests not only from the domestic progressive camp, but also from China, South Korea, and other Asian states. To settle this growing diplomatic controversy, the Ministry issued a "neighboring countries clause" that encouraged publishers to be more sensitive to the sentiments of Asian people (Bukh 2007, 689; Jeans 2005, 185; Nozaki 2005, 284-88). Although the nationalistic educational policy of the government has never faded away (Nozaki 2005, 288-90), since then “the narrative on Japan’s colonial past has grown thicker, in both a qualitative and quantitative sense, reaching its peak in 1997” (Bukh 2007, 689).

Reflecting this clause, all seven 1997 texts analyzed⁶ mention the Nanjing Massacre, the sexual exploitation of comfort women, the abduction of Koreans and Chinese individuals for compulsory labor, and other imperial policies such as enforced Japanese imperialist education, the imposition of statist Shintoism, the forced change to Japanese names, the conscription into the Japanese army, and the forced use of Japanese language. The Nanjing Massacre, in particular, where the Japanese military indiscriminately slaughtered Chinese POWs, children, women, and the elderly, is raised as one important symbol of Asian victimization, and many of the textbooks refer to wartime Japan’s sanko strategy (three-all strategy) of “burning all, killing all, and destroying all” to emphasize the brutality of the Japanese military. Furthermore, many textbooks have extra sections to describe people in Japanese-controlled areas, which now include not only China, Korea, and Taiwan, but also Southeast Asia. Students are, thus, encouraged to understand life in the Japanese-occupied areas and to sympathize with Asian feelings toward Japan. Indeed, some textbooks include quotes from junior high school texts used in victimized Asian states and wish to reveal how Japanese military acts in Asia were narrated from the victims’ own perspectives (Sasayama et al. 1997, 258-59; Teruya et al. 1997, 263). One of the quoted text states: “People will never forget the suffering and cruelty the Japanese brought to them” (Teruya et al. 1997, 263). Japanese barbarism directed against Asian people is, accordingly, represented more clearly than ever before in the 1997 textbooks. Along this line, some textbooks implicitly make a comparison between Nazi Germany and imperial Japan by placing a picture of the German military alongside a picture of the Japanese military and/or inserting a world map showing the course of battles around Germany and Japan (Teruya et al. 1997, 258-59; Yoshida et al. 1997, 258-59).

⁶ These texts are those published by Kyoiku Shuppan, Nihon Bunkyo Shuppan, Nihon Shoseki, Osaka Shoseki, Shimizu Shoin, Teikoku Shoin, and Tokyo Shoseki

This narrative inevitably identifies Japan as an aggressor who brought considerable suffering to Asia. Many textbooks indicate that, to Asians, the end of the war meant the end of the Japanese invasion and the liberation from Japanese domination. As for the responsibility of the Japanese people, textbooks provide mixed views. Some textbooks more clearly mention the supportive role played by the majority of Japanese people, who used to be regarded merely as victims of Japanese militarism in the 1966 textbooks. For example, it is now stated that people celebrated Japan’s victories in battles and feverishly supported the military. But almost all textbooks still explain that the government exerted information control to hide the truth from the people, and further prohibited any criticism of the government. Thus, the textbooks give the sense that the Japanese people did not support the aggressive war itself nor encouraged their military’s brutal behavior in Asia. Nevertheless, the culpability of Japan is generally acknowledged without making a distinction between the military and the people. Textbooks by the Teikoku Shoin (Teruya et al. 1997, 270-71) and Osaka Shoseki (Atsuta et al. 1997, 264-65), for example, discuss war responsibility issues debated today, including individual reparations to Koreans who were atom-bombed in Japan, former comfort women, and forced laborers from China and Korea. These texts now describe Japan's state responsibility, whereby the responsibility for Japan's brutality and barbarianism in Asia is represented at a state level.

Interestingly, alongside this Asian victimization narrative are the newly added descriptions of the Japanese military as "the losers" who miserably sacrificed many lives in the war. This narrative was absent in the older textbooks. These newer editions also start to represent the Japanese military as pitiable or even desperate in fighting a war against the United States. In other words, the Japanese military was fighting a state that was more industrialized and richer in natural resources. Japanese soldiers had to fight despite their supply lines being cut by enemy attacks. And, on some battlefields, the Japanese forces were totally annihilated by the United States. Their misery is further accentuated by such descriptions as "the soldiers were forced to fight until death" (Sasayama et al. 1997, 260) and "suicide attacks resulted in the loss of many young lives" (Kodama et al. 1997, 266). While the soldiers' tragic fate could still be attributed to the military clique—the "true" evil of Japan—these soldiers' sacrificial and pitiable deaths remind readers that the military, including the clique, was also the victim of the war it nevertheless started. Many textbooks now provide the number of Japanese victims, including civilians and soldiers, which is compared with the total number of victims in WWII and the victims in Asia.

As the Japanese military comes to be increasingly identified as the losers or even as victims, the victimhood of the Japanese people and of the Japanese state in general is established in relation to the United States. Indeed, the descriptions of the US bombings of Japanese cities are more detailed in all the textbooks, with, for instance, references to the Great Tokyo Air Raids of March 1945 that indiscriminately killed 100,000 civilians in one night. Hiroshima, Nagasaki, and Okinawa are now elevated to the status of powerful symbols of Japanese victimhood as, in each place, a significant portion of the civilian population was lost to US attacks. Regarding Hiroshima and Nagasaki, while the devastating power of atomic bombs is effectively demonstrated by pictures, paintings, and related experiences of victims, the horrible effects of these weapons suggest the immorality of using nuclear bombs that can instantly destroy cities and kill many people without making any distinction between combatants and non-combatants. Many textbooks state that the United States decided to drop those bombs not only because Japan initially ignored the Potsdam Declaration, but also because the United States wanted to create a postwar order more favorable to itself than to the Soviet Union. Thus, the Kyoiku Shuppan textbook asks: “Were atomic bombs really necessary to make Japan surrender?” (Sasayama et al. 1997, 264). In other words, the US choice to use these weapons is problematized and rendered immoral in these 1997 textbooks.

Okinawa as another symbol of Japanese victimhood, however, offers a somewhat ambiguous picture of Japan. On the one hand, the rising symbolism of Okinawan victimhood leads to substantial descriptions of the Battle of Okinawa where one quarter of the local population was lost in the direct confrontation between the Japanese military and the US army. The depictions of the Battle of Okinawa are an interesting development given that the narrative of the Battle was nonexistent in the 1966 texts. Many textbooks now insert a picture depicting Okinawan people, quite often the picture of an unfortunate Okinawan young girl carrying a white flag and walking alone in bare feet in the wilderness. Some textbooks also mention so-called Himeyuri schoolgirls who served as nurses for the Japanese military and died in the battle (Atsuta et al. 1997, 261; Teruya et al. 1997, 267). These young girls serve as powerful symbols of Japanese victimhood vis-à-vis the United States, representing the abhorrent nature of war.

On the other hand, these textbooks also note that the Japanese military, supposedly fighting for the Japanese state and thus for Okinawa, actually killed many Okinawans for suspected spy activity, and sometimes even ordered Okinawan citizens to kill themselves so that they would not surrender to the United States. The Okinawan people were indeed victims of war, but they were also the victims of the Japanese military's own aggression. This discourse makes a significant revision in the common narrative of Japanese victimhood vis-à-vis the Japanese military, in that the victimization of the Okinawan people by the military represents the victimhood of Okinawa (thus, not of Japan) vis-à-vis Japan, thereby challenging the Japanese victimhood as "a truly common and unifying experience" (Bukh 2007, 699). The textbook by the Osaka Shoseki even describes Okinawa as a "sacrifice for the defense of Japan's main islands," implying that Okinawa was not included in Japan in the minds of the Japanese military (Atsuta et al. 1997, 261). Okinawa, in this sense, constitutes a distinct identity within Japan or an "internal other" destabilizing the unitary identity of Japan.

In the 1997 texts, therefore, Japan's identity was constituted more clearly in relation to a victimized Asia and to the victorious United States. In relation to Asia, Japan was depicted as not only aggressive but also brutal and barbaric, while in relation to the United States, Japan was the loser and a victim of indiscriminate and deadly attacks. Japan's identity was, thus, increasingly produced in relation to these foreign others, making Japan an aggressor and, at the same time, a victim.

Textbooks after the 2001 Debate

The year 2001 marked another turning point for Japanese history textbooks. Central to the 2001 textbook debate was the authorization of textbooks written by Atarashii Rekishi Kyokasyo wo Tsukuru Kai. The strong progressive trend in history textbooks, as was shown in the 1997 texts, incited the conservative effort to “correct” the self-denouncing, “masochistic” view of Japanese history and thereby to write their own version of history (Bukh 2007; Jeans 2005, 183-93; McCormack 2000; Nelson 2002; Uesugi 2005). After undergoing revisions requested by the newly formed Ministry of Education and Science, the Tsukuru Kai textbooks passed the authorization process for the first time in 2001, greatly alarming the progressive camp. The conservative glorification of history, indeed, constituted an attempt to reshape Japan’s identity, particularly that of Asian victimizer. The Tsukuru Kai textbooks have been severely criticized for distorting history since then. However, a close examination of other textbooks published in 2002 reveals that the revisionist backlash was not limited to the Tsukuru Kai textbooks.⁷ In other words, other history textbooks taught less about Asian victimization, providing ambiguous pictures of Japanese military acts in Asia.

The Nanjing Massacre, for example, was clearly described as one of the Japanese atrocities in China in the 1997 editions. But, in the 2002 editions, many textbooks make the description brief and abstract. Four of eight junior high school textbooks authorized in 2001 refer to the massacre as the “Nanjing Incident,” while the description of the notorious sanko strategy was eliminated from all textbooks, except for one by Nihon Shoseki. The reference to comfort women was also largely deleted, resulting in the comfort women appearing in only three texts now (down from seven in 1997). Although the descriptions of Asian victimization were still present and much more detailed than in the 1966 texts, there was some clear regression from the 1997 texts.

⁷ In 2002, eight textbooks were authorized by the Ministry of Education and Science: Fusosha, Kyoiku Shuppan, Nihon Bunkyo Shuppan, Nihon Shoseki, Osaka Shoseki, Shimizu Shoin, Teikoku Shoin, and Tokyo Shoseki.

Among these textbooks, the Tsukuru Kai textbook is clearly the most conservative in its account of Asian victimization. Although the Manchurian Incident is explained as having been initiated by Japan, the textbook gives a justification for it by noting that Japan legitimately acquired South Manchuria and the South Manchurian Railway from Russia, and that there were 200,000 Japanese people in Manchuria who needed the protection of the Japanese military (Nishio et al. 2002, 266). Further, while the Chinese people occasionally interfered with the passage of trains, Japan was also faced with threats from both the north (the Soviet Union) and the south (the Nationalist party of China) (Nishio et al. 2002, 266). The occupation of the entire territory of Manchuria was thus alleged to have been planned as a way to solve these issues (accordingly, it was a rational decision) by a part of the Japanese military protesting against the Japanese government's excessively generous attitude toward Chinese nationalism. The Tsukuru Kai text additionally notes that, after the "incident," Manchuria "achieved economic growth" due to the expanding interests of Japanese heavy industries in Manchuria, while the anti-Japanese movement also began (Nisio et al. 2002, 268). Such a description of the allegedly favorable influences of the Japanese occupation is also seen in depictions of South Asia where the Japanese "advance" resulted in the acceleration of the independence of Asian states (Nishio et al. 2002, 280-82). More precisely, in the middle of the war, Japan approved the independence of Burma and the Philippines, and the tentative self-government of India. This experience later served to stiffen these nations' strong resistance against the returning colonial powers, from which they eventually attained true independence. In this sense, this textbook even attributes the cause of Japanese initial victories in the war partly to the support from Asian people who had long suffered from white colonialism and thus cooperated with Japan to fight against the West (Nishio et al. 2002, 277).

The effects of Japan's invasion are, accordingly, considered to be not entirely negative. This text also describes the aggressive and selfish nature of Asian opposition to the Japanese military in its depiction of anti-Japanese movements in China, thereby representing the Chinese as irrational and the Japanese aggression as a natural response to this aggression (Nishio et al. 2002, 263-65, 270). Such a revised narrative also appears in the Osaka Shoseki text that similarly states that some Taiwanese and Koreans armed themselves and attacked Japanese people and military in their countries (Atsuta et al. 2002, 161, 165).

That being said, all textbooks mention Japanese colonial policies imposed on Asian people, including imperial education, the forced use of the Japanese language, and conscription for forced labor and into the Japanese army. The brutal and aggressive behavior of the Japanese military and Japan's intention to invade and control Asia are still very clear in these textbooks. The involvement of the government in the Japanese occupation of Asia and cooperation from Japanese people for it are even clearer in some respects. Some textbooks now refer to Japanese settlers who were sent to China, particularly to strategically important places, to farm the land Chinese people were forced to sell cheaply to Japan.

Indeed, subtle but significant changes in the familiar Japanese victimhood narrative were made in some of the 2002 texts as well. For instance, the Nihon Shoseki 1997 text states: “As the war was protracted, military spending increased, and the mechanisms to force all to cooperate for the war were made” (Kodama et al. 1997, 259). However, in its 2002 text, it instead writes: “To support this protracted war, the mechanism to cooperate for the war was made domestically” (Kodama et al. 2002, 177). In other words, the forced element is less clear in the newer version. In another textbook (Tokyo Shoseki), the 1997 edition stating that “the government did not tell the truth about the war, and the people believed Japan’s victory in the war” (Yoshida et al. 1997, 263) was changed in the 2002 edition to read: “many people believed the justice of the war and cooperated with the government to win the war” (Tanabe et al. 2002, 174). While there are still a few textbooks that increased the descriptions of Japanese suffering brought by the military government, these textbooks generally give an impression that people were mobilized for the war. They were subjected to strict governmental controls, but they were not really “victimized” by the military. Rather, the Japanese state itself was actively fighting the war, in which more or less cooperative and supportive Japanese people participated. The supportive role played by the people is perhaps best represented in the Tsukuru Kai text, ironically because it attempts to glorify the past: both soldiers and people shared national goals and fought together. Thus, this textbook shows its admiration for the people by stating that “despite these hardships, many people worked well and fought well, hoping to win the war” (Nishio et al. 2002, 284).

The revised narrative, then, serves to reinforce the Asian victimization discourse by making not only the military but also the people and the state as a whole responsible for fighting the war, hurting many Asians, and destroying their countries. And yet, as the narrative identifying the Japanese people as victims of the Japanese military and of the militarist government becomes weak, the Japanese people's victimhood comes to be determined through their fighting the tragic war against the United States. The war produced victims and destroyed everything—lives, homes, assets, industries, cities, and the country itself. As the defeat in the war is given much importance in the narrative, the US aggression is increasingly emphasized in the story of “how Japan was crushed in the war.”

The trend toward stressing the US attacks on Japan more fully can be seen in most of the textbooks. It is done, for example, by emphasizing the indiscriminate nature of US air raids on Japanese cities and the cruelty of the atomic bombs dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. In some textbooks, the description of the Battle of Okinawa was also changed, not only by further highlighting the victimhood of civilians, but also by deleting the brutality of the Japanese military toward Okinawan people from the texts. Thus, the Okinawan people are presented more clearly as the victims of the Pacific War and less as the victims of internal discrimination by the Japanese mainland. Indeed, sacrificial deaths of Japanese soldiers are still present in the narrative, perhaps to a lesser extent though, thereby continuing to blur the distinction between the Japanese people and the military in terms of their victimhood in the war. The defeat in the war is, therefore, represented as a “shared experience” of the entire Japanese nation. The foundational myth of Japanese victimhood as well as of Asian victimization accordingly reifies postwar Japan as a particular kind of subject—a state that knows the tragedy of war, the evilness of militarism, and the importance of peace—which is destined to face postwar realities as both a war victim and a former aggressor and to fulfill its special pacifist mission in the world.

Conclusion

The above comparative analysis of Japanese history textbooks has revealed the centrality of the collective memory of WWII in foundational myths about postwar Japan. Indeed, the defeat of Japan in the war put an end to the “era of militarism and state-centrism” while simultaneously making a new start for postwar Japan, now a pacifist state determined to bring peace to the world rather than misery. Wartime Japan, in this sense, constitutes what postwar Japan is not. The articulation of wartime Japan makes possible the construction of postwar pacifist Japan as a distinct identity. This means the very construction of the “past” is a condition of possibility for “pacifist Japan.”

Yet, my analysis also showed that the “past” could be constructed in different ways. The above analysis revealed that different entities could be recognized as victims and assailants. Thus, it is not inevitable that Japan should be identified as a victim of atomic bombings or Asian peoples as victims of Japanese aggression. History does not present itself as the meaningful story of a given subject. Rather, the very representations of what “our” past is give meaning to certain events while omitting others in history books, thereby producing “our” national history to be remembered. In this sense, history textbooks are not simply sites of discussion about “what happened” in “our” history. They are also productive of the “past.” The past is a discursive construction.

The discussion of the past is, however, not limited to history education. How to narrate history has grave implications for policies, too. For instance, as the following chapters will show, Japan is still haunted by the legacy of World War II and thus is faced with a series of issues with other states as a loser of the war and as a former international aggressor. Historical narratives are, in this respect, intertwined with policy formulations. Foreign policy discourse can also be a critical space where Japan's "past" is articulated, whereby the "past" provides the discursive foundation for policies to be taken by a subject invoked as an initiator of action.

In the following chapters, I will analyze two crucial postwar issues that still haunt Japan: (1) the issue of the rape of Japanese girls by US GIs in Okinawa, where the United States has maintained its military presence since World War II; and (2) the comfort women issue, whereby Japan has been blamed for its wartime sexual enslavement of Asian women. Although the focus is placed on women's issues, these two detailed case studies aim to examine the conflicted images of postwar Japan as both a victim of crushing attacks by the United States and a former aggressor in Asia. In each case, Japan performatively creates and recreates itself as a reborn state by articulating its "past" as Japan's haunting shadow that, in turn, makes possible pacifist Japan as an antithesis to the past self. Yet, as history can be constructed in many different ways, competing narratives also problematize the boundaries created between the past self and the new self. The legacy of WWII brought up as foreign policy issues, therefore, both offers a condition of possibility for "pacifist Japan" and constitutes a site of contestation where a distinction between a new Japan and an old Japan becomes problematic.

IV. BETWEEN PARTNER AND OCCUPIED VICTIM: OKINAWA AS FEMALE BODY AND THE DESTABILIZATION OF A NEW JAPAN

On August 15, 1945, Japanese Emperor Hirohito announced the end of the Pacific War to his subjects on the radio. By “endur[ing] the unendurable and bear[ing] the unbearable,” the emperor declared to have accepted the Potsdam Declaration and expressed his hope to “open the way for a great peace for thousands of generations to come” (Dower 1999, 36). This broadcast symbolically marked the beginning of “postwar Japan,” while it also brought an end to the imperial era of Japan. Yet, the “end” meant to the Japanese people nothing less than the “defeat” of Japan in the war. Countless lives were lost not only on the battlefields in Asia and the Pacific, but also in the homeland, where civilians were killed in air raids, in the atomic bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and in a fierce battle in Okinawa. People lost houses and suffered a lack of food and medicine. Indeed, “after U.S. forces finished their work, sixty-six of Japan’s largest cities were devastated, with only 60 percent of built-up areas still standing” (Kovner 2009, 784). The homeless, the malnourished, and the poor became part of the everyday scene of postwar Japan.

When the war ended, the Japanese people were left in chaos and overwhelmed by a great sense of loss. People in Okinawa, in particular, were faced with the catastrophic situation as a result of the ground war fought between the Japanese military and US forces on their islands. The “Battle of Okinawa,” known as one of the largest and bloodiest battles between Japan and the United States during World War II, ended in the loss of one quarter of the local population, victimizing combatants and non-combatants alike. After the battle, Okinawa was placed under the direct military control of the United States and thereby detached from the rest of Japan, which fell under the Allied authority instead. Due to the geostrategic importance given to this area, the United States promptly established a military government and constructed military facilities to transform Okinawa into America's "keystone of the Pacific" (Matsumoto 2004, 38). The US governance of Okinawa continued until 1972. For almost 30 years, the reversion of Okinawa to Japan had been an earnest desire for both Japan and Okinawa. Since the mid-1960s, Japan had actively addressed the issue of Okinawa's reversion and negotiated the conditions for the reversion with the United States. Prime Minister Sato Eisaku occasionally showed his determination to "resolve the last vestige of the Pacific War" and thus to put "the postwar period" to an end by achieving Okinawa's return to Japan (Togo 2005, 65).

After years of negotiation, Okinawa was finally returned to Japan in 1972. But, as Sheila A. Smith (2001, 181) notes, what was really ended by the reversion was "Japan's postwar"—that is, "Okinawa's postwar in fact began as Japan's ended." Indeed, even after the reversion to Japan, Okinawa remained under the constraint of US military bases. The US bases constructed during the occupation era still occupy 10% of Okinawa Prefecture or 17% of Okinawa Island (the main island in the prefecture), now serving as a "pillar of the Japan-US alliance." The continued presence of foreign military keeps reminding people on Okinawa that they remain trapped in the postwar reality of a "defeated state," and thus that the "postwar era" has not yet ended in Okinawa.

Okinawa has since been an important source of national imagination for postwar Japan. While US bases in Okinawa represent a strong military partnership between Japan and the United States, Okinawa's continued subjugation to the US military indicates Japan's relative weakness, vulnerability, and subordination vis-à-vis its alleged "partner." The US bases serve as a reminder of the tragic history of Okinawa and nurture the Okinawan/Japanese sense of victimhood vis-à-vis the United States. In the eyes of many Okinawans and Japanese, thus, Okinawa is still under the virtual occupation of the United States, and the history of victimization continues in Okinawa. The more Japan strengthens its ties with the United States, the more deeply these bases become rooted in Okinawa. Although the security treaty between Japan and the United States legitimizes the US military presence in Okinawa and elsewhere in Japan as "public assets" providing security for Japan and beyond, these US bases signal Japan's compromised sovereignty and American intrusion into Japan's "internal" space.

In this context, US bases keep fostering the senses of insecurity and victimhood, especially among the local people whose deep-seated feeling of hostility becomes heightened by occasional crimes and accidents caused by US GIs. Since their landing on Okinawa during World War II, US military personnel have repeatedly perpetrated crimes and caused accidents that have victimized the local population. According to the Military Base Affairs Division of Okinawa Prefecture, between 1972 and 2011, there were 5,747 documented crimes committed by US GIs in Okinawa, including 568 heinous crimes (e.g., murder and arson) and 1,039 crimes involving injuries. In addition, since the reversion, the US military has caused 522 aircraft accidents, 528 fires, and a number of serious environmental pollution episodes in Okinawa (Okinawa kenchiji koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2012, Chapter IV). These incidents have greatly threatened the safety of the Okinawan people. The repeated crimes and accidents not only directly hurt the local people, but they also reinforce their awareness of foreign military domination. In fact, despite the fact that a significant number of crimes are committed by US personnel in Okinawa, these crimes are rarely tried and, even if tried, American suspects tend to be acquitted or leniently sentenced (Hayashi 2006, 1).⁸ Quite often, the Status of Forces Agreement also prevents the local police from investigating incidents and taking American GIs into custody. Even a small crime can thus trigger a strong emotional response from people, which further intensifies the belief that Okinawa remains an occupied territory of the United States.

It is in this context that the crimes and accidents by American troops often become issues of national importance. Among the crimes that become highly politicized are rapes, particularly the rapes of young Okinawan girls. According to a survey, there were 111 rape incidents committed by US GIs and their families in Okinawa between 1972 and 1994.⁹ In spite of their limited number (approximately 2% of US military crimes reported in Okinawa), assaults on women and vulnerable young girls in particular have caused strong emotional reactions among the Japanese people, developing into diplomatic issues between Japan and the United States. In 1995, for instance, the rape of a 12-year-old Okinawan girl by three US GIs inspired an organized protest by 85,000 people who demanded official US apologies to the victim, the review of the Status of Forces Agreement, and the reduction of US military bases in Okinawa. The Japanese and

⁸ According to Ryukyu Shinpo, approximately 80% of crimes by US GIs in Japan are not brought to justice. “Zainichi beigun hanzai, 8 wari ga fukiso: ‘tokubetsu atsukai’ ukibori” [Crimes by the US Military in Japan, 80% Not Prosecuted: “Special Treatment” Revealed], Ryukyu Shinpo, 16 May, 2009.

⁹ Oga, Kazuo, “Kisha no me: Okinawa joji boko jiken: Chii kyotei dake ni torawarezu kichi no sonzai koso saiko wo” [Journalist’s Eyes: The Rape of a Female Child in Okinawa: Reconsider Not Only the SOFA But the Presence of Military Bases], Mainichi Shinbun, 26 September, 1995.

US governments were pressed to renegotiate the terms of the treaty as a result of the victimization of one girl by American GIs.

As discussed in Chapter II, rape not only constitutes one kind of crime against a particular woman, but also often serves as a symbol of national defilement and humiliation. As Michael S. Molasky (1999, 51) observes,

No single act, not even murder, surpasses rape in its ability to dramatize the fear and humiliation of life under foreign occupation. And no victim better symbolizes the vulnerability of the social body than does a young girl. The girl who was raped on 4 September 1995 comes as close to embodying pure victimhood as any figure, real or imagined, in Okinawa's postwar collective memory. And the fact that she remains unknown by name while her fate is known to everyone only heightens her allegorical value.

In the national imagination of Okinawa, the body of the innocent Okinawan girl raped by American soldiers symbolizes the historical subjugation, oppression, and humiliation of Okinawa's body politic. As a perfect symbol of Okinawa, the rape victim, thus, comes to embody the Okinawan/Japanese victimhood vis-à-vis the United States, while being also transformed into an instrument of the "politics of Okinawan 'victimization' by American troops" (Osius 2002, 57).

To explore Okinawa as an important political space that defines the identity of postwar Japan, this chapter looks into one of the recent rape incidents committed by US servicemen in Okinawa. The case studied occurred in February 2008. This time, a 14-year-old girl was assaulted by a US Marine. Just like the 1995 rape case, the 2008 incident evoked a strong public response and was widely discussed in the media as well as in the political arena. The close examination of the discourses on this rape case will show that the rape was shaped and reshaped into various "symbols," which created the possibility that different Japanese national selves could be constructed vis-à-vis the US other. In particular, the analysis will demonstrate that, by talking about the rape, Japan's emasculated identity was discursively constructed in relation to the dangerous American other, and that the image of Japan as an equal partner of the United States was seriously challenged.

Analyzing Okinawa as a critical space where "Japan" is constructed is crucial for several reasons. First, the Battle of Okinawa was one of the few ground battles waged within present-day Japanese borders during WWII. Okinawa's harsh experience of the war and occupation has produced a strong culture of peace in Okinawa. Thus, "second only to Hiroshima, Okinawa is considered the most pacifist of Japan's prefectures" (Osius 2002, 54). Given that pacifism is believed to characterize "postwar Japan" in opposition to "wartime Japan," Okinawa lies at the heart of postwar Japan's collective memory, offering a source for its postwar identity and pacifism.

And yet, Okinawa is also a place where differences within Japan can be revealed. As suggested, Okinawa had a unique experience that other Japanese territories did not share during and after World War II. For instance, while in mainland Japan the war was ended by the Emperor on August 15, few listened to the broadcast in Okinawa, where the end of the war was brought by the United States, or more precisely, by Okinawa's complete subjugation by the US military. Further, while the Allied occupation started in mainland Japan after the war, for Okinawa, American occupation started and gradually expanded during the Battle of Okinawa. This means that Okinawan people did not share with their fellow Japanese the "myth" of a new Japan born on August 15, 1945 through the voice of the Emperor (Kitamura 2009, 45). Moreover, after the war, Okinawan people were placed under the direct control of the United States and “outside” of Japan. Okinawan people were required to obtain a visa to go to the mainland and could not even become part of independent Japan when Japan regained sovereignty (S.A. Smith 2001, 181). Although Okinawa was returned to Japan in 1972, many parts of the islands are still occupied by US military bases as was mentioned above, and Okinawa’s landscape has not changed much. Although Okinawa represents less than 1% of the entire Japanese territory, US bases there account for approximately 75% of the US military areas established throughout the territory of Japan (Okinawa kenchiiji koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2011, 1). The heavy concentration of American bases in Okinawa thus suggests the heavy burden placed on Okinawa by mainland Japan, showing a deep division within Japan.

These different postwar situations, however, provide only a partial picture of Japan and Okinawa. Historically, Okinawa was an independent state, known as the Ryukyu Kingdom, which was integrated into Japan in the 19th century. Inheriting the cultural heritage of the Ryukyu Kingdom, Okinawa has retained a unique culture and a language, which still serve as signifiers for their distinct identity. Although the “Japanization” of Okinawa was vigorously promoted during WWII, when Okinawans found a chance to be fully integrated into the Japanese nation, Okinawa has always been Japan’s “periphery” and/or an “internal other” (Angst 1997; Furuki 2003; Inoue 2007). Okinawa’s distinct cultural, economic, and social structures often influenced political leaders to treat Okinawa differently (e.g., making Okinawa a battlefield to delay US invasion to the Japanese mainland and thus using Okinawan civilians as “human shields”) (Inoue 2007, 59; Kitamura 2009, 37-8; Osius 2002, 54). Yet, more importantly, the “primitive,” “premature,” “dependent,” and “feminized” images of Okinawa have also offered “a necessary and perfect reverse (gendered) image to a Japanese political identity of cultural, technological, and moral superiority” (Angst 1997, 101). Okinawa’s distinctiveness is, in this sense, integral to Japan’s progressive and superior identity—it is a mirror onto which Japan needs to project what it is and what it is not.

The rapes of Okinawan girls should also be situated in the context of these complex relationships between Japan, Okinawa, and the United States. To explore this dynamic space of identity/boundary formation, this chapter first looks into the historical context of the Okinawan problem. A special focus is placed on how women became symbolic of the history of Japan or Okinawa. This historical analysis will demonstrate that women’s bodies became a key site of contestation between Japan and the United States. The historical analysis is followed by a close reading of Japanese White Papers on Defense, which provide an official account of the Japan-US alliance and the Okinawa problem. This analysis will reveal how, in official foreign policy texts, Japan projects its identity as a reliable, equal partner of the United States, thereby trying to create discursive boundaries between itself and the past dependent Japanese self. The subsequent part of the chapter looks at the 2008 rape incident and examines media discourses on the rape of the Okinawan girl. It will show the crucial role played by the rape victim in reimagining Okinawa and Japan vis-à-vis the United States. It will be argued that Japan is still haunted by the image of itself as a defeated/victimized state, the very image provided by the Okinawan girl raped by a US GI. Still, the girl also represents a distinct Okinawan identity, which powerfully undermines a unitary Japanese self projected in official discourse. One can say that Japanese identity politics is, therefore, waged over the body of an Okinawan raped girl.

Struggling with Defeat: Subjugated Nation, Subjugated Bodies, and Postwar Japan

The 1951 San Francisco Peace Treaty that formally terminated the Second World War between Japan and the Allies marked a new start for postwar Japan. The treaty recovered Japan's full sovereignty and thereby ended approximately seven years of Allied occupation. With this new departure, Japan and the United States concluded a military alliance, which has since legitimized the continued military presence of the United States in Japan. The simultaneous conclusion of the San Francisco Peace Treaty and the Japan-US Security Treaty accordingly changed the nature of the US military deployed in Japan. That is, "America was no longer the imposing occupying force but became a kind of 'big brother'" (Togo 2005, 55). The security treaty, in fact, reproduced the unequal relationship between Japan and the United States. The security treaty of 1951 imposed the obligation on Japan to provide facilities for use by US forces in Japan while not obliging the United States to defend Japan if attacked. Further, the language of the treaty suggested that the United States was expected (at the request of the Japanese government) to intervene in large-scale domestic riots and other disturbances in Japan, which was now recognized as an "independent," "sovereign" state under international law. The treaty, moreover, did not grant Japan the right to abrogate the treaty and even the competence to decide the nature and scope of the US forces stationed in Japan.¹⁰ While it allowed Japan to take the option of maintaining its defense forces to a minimal level and thereby to uphold pacifism and focus on economic reconstruction, the treaty still exhibited traces of the relationship between "the occupying force" and "the occupied nation,” and even reproduced it. Indeed, the treaty served to define the security position of postwar Japan as a member of the West and thus provided the grounds for the United States to use Japan as America’s strategic stronghold in the Asia-Pacific area (Sakamoto 1999, 66-7).

¹⁰ The security treaty was revised in 1960, and these terms of the treaty unfavorable to Japan were changed. Most importantly, the 1960 security treaty obliges the United States to defend Japan, while the domestic riot clause was removed from the treaty.

The relationship between the United States and Japan, in this sense, did not fundamentally change after the occupation. Japan remained subordinate to the United States, and the US military in Japan was given a privileged status according to the Status of Forces Agreement. More importantly, Okinawa was left under the direct control of the US military that had taken Okinawa during the bloody Battle of Okinawa in 1945. Under Article 3 of the San Francisco Peace Treaty, the United States was given the right to exercise all administrative, legislative, and jurisdictional rights over the Ryukyu Islands. Thus, in the eyes of Okinawans, the United States was still “the occupier” who suppressed their autonomy and prevented their reunification with the Japanese nation. The reality of Okinawa reminded many that the Japan-US relationship was not so much an “allied” partnership as “a loser and a winner” type of relationship (Tadokoro 1999, 134-35).

Okinawa’s special standing was not accidental, but developed out of the geostrategic concerns of the United States. Since WWII, Okinawa has been regarded as an important site of US strategic military presence. First as a “base necessary to monitor or control Japan” and later as a “deterrent, as well as a potential forward base against the Soviet Union (and Communist China),” US military bases in Okinawa have served US global military strategy (Eldridge 2001, 10). Against the background of the birth of Communist China (in 1949) and the outbreak of the Korean War (in 1950), the US military started to construct permanent military facilities throughout Okinawa with a clear intention to retain the islands in the long term. As a ground war had resulted in the military occupation of Okinawa, the construction of military bases was initially justified on the grounds that Okinawa was a battlefield becoming an occupied territory where the United States was given the right to use land for military purposes under the Hague Convention of 1907 (Ibata 2010, 118-19; Okinawa kenchiji koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2008, 1). In Article 23 of the Hague Convention, it is stipulated that “it is especially forbidden [...] (g) To destroy or seize the enemy’s property, unless such destruction or seizure be imperatively demanded by the necessities of war” (emphasis added). This provision, however, does not apply to Japan after its surrender and, thus, does not justify the requisition and construction of bases after August 1945. The Hague Convention’s Article 52 also prescribes: “Requisitions in kind and services shall not be demanded from municipalities or inhabitants except for the needs of the army of occupation.” For the US military, this provision provided the legal ground for US requisition of land until the peace treaty entered into force in 1952 (see CA Proclamation 26 December 5, 1953). However, it is important to note that the Hague Convention prohibits confiscation of private property (Art. 46) and pillage (Art. 47) by the occupying power, and requires compensation if requisition is needed (Art. 52). Such payment was never made during the US occupation.

While Japan was given its independence in 1952, the conclusion of the San Francisco Peace Treaty hardly altered the situation of Okinawa. While the entry into force of the treaty meant the formal end of WWII between Japan and the Allies, thus making the Hague Convention inapplicable to Okinawa, the peace treaty also gave the United States the status of administrator of Okinawa. A United States Civil Administration of the Ryukyu Islands (USCAR) issued a series of ordinances and proclamations to keep and expand military areas where it constructed facilities for US forces. In fact, USCAR “was effectively a military government in disguise” that established a harsh and oppressive military rule over Okinawan people (Aldous 2003, 488). USCAR not only suppressed those who promoted the cause of reversion of Okinawa to Japan by labeling them “communists,” but it also forcibly removed democratically elected figures from office to prevent any potential challenge to its authority (Aldous 2003, 487-90; Gabe 2004, 122-24; Inoue 2007, 41-8). In particular, USCAR assumed an intolerant stance on the issue of land for military bases, which provoked an intense opposition among Okinawans. Initially, under CA Ordinance No. 91 “Authority to Contract” (November 1, 1952), the US authority tried to draw up a contract on a volunteer basis with the owners of the land that the US military had already occupied. Facing their reluctance to lease to the occupier at an excessively cheap price, however, the US military expropriated the land by force. CA Proclamation No. 26 “Compensation for Use of Real Estate within Military Areas” (December 5, 1953) unilaterally legitimated the continued use of already acquired land, while, under the provisions of CA Ordinance No. 109 “Land Acquisition Procedure” (April 3, 1953), USCAR authorized itself the right to forcibly acquire new land. In many places, houses were destroyed and properties were taken by force (Okinawa kenchiji koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2008, 2). Anti-US military bases movements were organized throughout Okinawa where the resentment against the US military developed rapidly. Despite an “island-wide struggle” of Okinawans (shima gurumi toso) (1953-58) that achieved some minor changes in the American manner of expropriation, by the time of Okinawa's reversion, US military facilities occupied 14.8% of Okinawa Prefecture and 27.2% of Okinawa Island (Okinawa kenchi koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2008, 6). Today most of these facilities remain in use by the US military, which have returned only 17.2% of the expropriated/leased lands to Japan since the reversion (Okinawa kenchi koshitsu kichi taisaku ka 2008, 11). The violent way of taking land away from the locals in order to construct military bases has left a lingering tension that has plagued Okinawa and the US military until today.

The construction of US military bases in Okinawa eventually resulted in the "militarization of Okinawa," forcing Okinawan people to live with US forces indefinitely. Yet, as Tsuyoshi Kitamura (2009, 46) points out, it should be noted that the United States constructed military bases in Okinawa exactly when mainland Japan was reconstructed as a peaceful democratic state under the Allied guidance. This means that the "militarization" of Okinawa and the "demilitarization" of Japan occurred simultaneously. Indeed, while Okinawa fell under the sole and direct control of the United States, the rest of Japan was placed under the indirect control of the Allies whose primary goals were to demilitarize and democratize postwar Japan.¹¹ Thus, at the time democracy and human rights were severely restricted in Okinawa, the pacifist Constitution was promulgated in mainland Japan, bringing about a series of democratic reforms in Japanese society. Moreover, in the 1950s, when USCAR doubled the number of military areas in Okinawa, US military bases in mainland Japan were steadily reduced, putting an end to their role as occupying bases. With regard to Okinawa, Japan instead concluded and even renewed in 1960 a security treaty with the United States that eventually promoted the militarization of Okinawa as a way to provide security for the main islands of Japan. Thus, since the reversion of Okinawa, the Japanese government has in fact striven to maintain US military bases by signing contracts with Okinawan landlords and paying them rent on behalf of the United States. “Contrary to the heartfelt pleas of the majority of Okinawans,” therefore, “the reversion meant not the end, but a new beginning, of Okinawa’s role as the foundation of the U.S.-Japan Security Treaty system” (Inoue 2007, 36). Japan’s postwar stability and peace have always resulted in the sacrifice of Okinawa. Takazato Suzuyo describes Okinawa as “the prostituted daughter of Japan.” Takazato argues: “Japan used her daughter as a breakwater to keep the battlefields from spreading over the mainland until the end of World War II. After the war, she enjoyed economic prosperity by selling the daughter to the United States” (Gerson 1996, 26)

¹¹ A Government of Ryukyu Islands (GRI) was formed in 1952 succeeding to the previous governmental body of Okinawa. However, GRI was subordinate to USCAR that severely limited the authority of GRI (Aldous 2003, 488).

The militarization of Okinawa has since created a structural dependence of Okinawans vis-à-vis the US military. During the first few years after the war, Okinawans heavily relied on the occupier for food, clothing, shelter, and work. Indeed, the US military placed Okinawans into internment camps, where Okinawans “virtually lived with the American occupiers” (Molasky 1999, 19). Even after people were allowed to leave the camps, the local economy remained dependent on the US military since the war had devastated the entire economic structure of Okinawa. The expansion of military areas further created obstacles to economic growth, while also developing new businesses around bases. Okinawans have, thus, developed an uneasy relationship with the American troops. That is to say, the US military has been both Okinawa's "occupier" and an important "customer."

The ambivalent relationship between Okinawans and the US military was also displayed through sexual relationships between Okinawan women and American soldiers. In occupied Okinawa, many women sold their bodies for sex for survival. Concerned about the spread of venereal disease, the US military initially banned Okinawan prostitutes from dealing with US GIs. Yet, as the decision was made to retain Okinawa in the long term, more military bases were constructed, resulting in a heavier concentration of American troops in Okinawa. There were not only those young American soldiers deployed in the military bases in Okinawa but also those who temporarily stayed in Okinawa while involved in the Korean War and later in the Vietnam War. Upon request of the US military, "special eating and drinking shops" (tokushu inshokuten) catering specifically to American soldiers were created, becoming entertainment centers where prostitution was publically committed (Hayashi 2006, 3-4). Many US servicemen were involved in this mode of prostitution, although rapes of Okinawan women also occurred frequently. An estimate suggests that, in the three-month military campaign in Okinawa from April to June 1945, more than 10,000 women were raped by US troops (Schrijvers 2002, 212). Military orders could not stop frequent sexual assaults on local women as well as on female American soldiers even after the battle ended. Women were kidnapped and raped inside and outside internment camps, in their own houses, and in the fields. Rape victims included not only elementary school girls but also a nine-month-old baby (Omori 2005, 82-3).

Among such sexual crimes is a famous rape incident that happened in 1955. A six-year-old girl was kidnapped and repeatedly raped by a US GI before being brutally murdered. Her lower abdomen was slit up, and her body was discarded in a garbage box in a military area. The rapist was court-martialed and sentenced to death. However, after he was sent back to the United States, the sentence was commuted into 45 years of hard labor (Omori 2005, 83). In fact, those US servicemen and women who committed crimes against the local Japanese population were usually given lenient punishment by the US military.

Such an insecure situation surrounding women was not so much different in occupied Japan where the Allied forces entered Japan in droves after the war ended. Hundreds of rapes were committed against Japanese women, although the censorship by the General Headquarters, Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (GHQ/SCAP), which aimed at democratizing postwar Japan, ironically led to the concealment of these incidents by US soldiers (Dower 1999, 412; Hayashi 2006, 8-9). A concern about rapes by American troops had been strong in Japanese society even before the occupying forces came to Japan. It was widely believed that “the enemy, once landed, [would] violate women one after another” (Dower 1999, 124). To stave off such a danger, Japanese police and officials organized the “Recreation and Amusement Association” (tokushu ian shisetsu kyokai or RAA), a prostitution system specifically designed to handle the sexual desires of foreign occupiers. The RAA had a clear goal “to serve as a ‘female floodwall’ (onna no bohatei), channeling this foreign male desire into designated (lower-class) female bodies, thereby protecting the pure women of Japan’s middle- and upper-classes” (Molasky 1999, 105). Not only professional prostitutes but also inexperienced women were recruited for the RAA. Many women who volunteered to offer their bodies were poor, but quite a few of them worked in the spirit of “self-sacrifice” that the wartime Japanese government had fostered among the Japanese population (Dower 1999, 127).

The Japanese fear of rapes of the nation’s women was so intense that the planning of RAA started only a few days after Japan surrendered. Such an enterprise was, in fact, not new in Japan. Special pleasure quarters were set up for foreigners soon after Japan was pressed to abandon its national isolation policy at the demand of US Commodore Matthew Perry in 1854 (Dower 1999, 126). Japan also had experience with establishing state-sponsored brothels for the Japanese Imperial Military, or so-called “comfort stations,” which were built throughout Japan and Asia during WWII (see Chapter V).

Thanks to Japanese experience and efforts, on the very day the Allied Forces arrived in Japan, RAA facilities were opened and visited by hundreds of American occupiers. This “postwar comfort women system” (Molasky 1999, 105) was a successful enterprise in that rapes by American troops were to some extent prevented and the number remained relatively low (Dower 1999, 130). The number of brothels rapidly increased in Tokyo and many other cities as the demand for cheap girls available at these facilities grew. Since many soldiers caught venereal diseases, however, the RAA was abolished within a year of its establishment, eventually increasing the number of rapes by US GIs (Dower 1999, 579n16). The GHQ rendered registered prostitution illegal, although brothels never disappeared in Japan. Rather, they took a new form known as “special eating and drinking shops.” Many prostitutes worked legally in these shops in designated areas called “red line districts” (akasen chitai) or illegally on street corners outside the red line districts called “blue line districts” (aosen chitai).

Prostitutes, who were more commonly called “panpan,” became a new symbol of postwar Japan. On the one hand, these women “became associated with the liberation of repressed sexuality” (Dower 1999, 133) and the “rejection of traditional female domesticity” (Molasky 1999, 109). Although many women became prostitutes because they faced acute economic insecurity as war orphans or widows, many others chose to prostitute themselves out of curiosity and for ephemeral pleasures (Dower 1999, 133-34). While defiant of the sexual authority of Japanese men, they wore fashionable dresses, high heels, and heavy makeup—literally, they “embraced not only the occupiers themselves but American mannerisms and fashion” (Molasky 1999, 103). While they were an object of derision and disdain, many people also looked at the panpan with admiration and envy. Their intimate contact with the occupiers suggested their closeness to America’s affluence and luxury—food, liquor, sweets, cigarettes, and lipsticks—which were attractive to many people living in the devastated land. As John W. Dower (1999, 137) writes, “the sensual panpan was as close as anyone in Japan might hope to get, in the flesh, to Hollywood.”

On the other hand, while they were symbolic of the “Americanization” of postwar Japan, the panpan who sold their bodies to the conqueror hurt the national pride, especially that of the Japanese males. The intimate relationship between the panpan and American soldiers not only threatened the purity of Japan’s body politic, but also allowed the occupiers to transgress the national boundaries embodied in and by Japanese women. Moreover, Dower (1999, 138) writes,

The ubiquitous sexuality linking conqueror and conquered had far-reaching ramifications insofar as American perceptions of the defeated nation and its people were concerned. To some members of the occupation force, native women came to be regarded as little more than available sexual objects [...]. More strikingly, the defeated country itself was feminized in the minds of the Americans who poured in. The enemy was transformed with startling suddenness from a bestial people fit to be annihilated into receptive exotics to be handled and enjoyed. That enjoyment was palpable—the panpan personified this. Japan—only yesterday a menacing, masculine threat—had been transformed, almost in the blink of an eye, into a compliant, feminine body on which the white victors could impose their will.

The panpan were, in other words, a symbol of “sexualized” and “feminized” Japan. In fact, Molasky (1999) suggests that, in Japanese literature, particularly in the writings of Japanese men, the panpan were often described as vulnerable “victims” whose fall was attributed to the Americans, who had destroyed Japan and violated its autonomy. As such, many men’s writings “deploy[ed] women’s sexual subjugation to construct a gendered national allegory of the occupation era, thereby ensuring that Japanese men [were] included among those victimized by the foreign occupiers” (Molasky 1999, 129).

After the occupation ended, like Okinawa, mainland Japan was used as a “rest and recuperation center” (R&R center) for those soldiers fighting the Korean War. R&R facilities were constructed in several sites, where sexual services were also offered. According to Hayashi (2006), Japan and the United States actually developed cooperative relations for regulating prostitution both around US military bases (including R&R centers) and in blue line districts. Like South Korea, where the government exercised strict control over prostitution camps around US military bases so as to provide American troops with a better environment and thus to secure US military commitment to South Korea, the Japanese government supported the US military by controlling Japanese women and providing “safe sex” for the American soldiers (Moon 1997). Yet, by 1960, most of the US military withdrew from Japan, resulting in lower demand for prostitutes and a lower number of crimes committed by Americans.

The decreasing sexual interaction between Japanese women and American troops in mainland Japan was, however, in clear contrast to the situation of Okinawan women. As mentioned earlier, the demilitarization of mainland Japan led to the militarization of Okinawa, where a larger number of American servicemen and women contributed to the continued subjugation of the Okinawan people. Although Okinawa was returned to Japan in 1972, the end of US military control did not become the end of US domination of Okinawa, as we saw above. The US military still provided a source of revenue for Okinawa, even if many Okinawan people were victimized by crimes and accidents committed by US GIs.¹² Indeed, 60% of the crimes perpetrated by US military personnel in Japan between 1972 and 2004 have been concentrated in Okinawa (Hayashi 2006, 1). To this day, the structure of Okinawan victimization has not changed much, keeping Okinawan women insecure and vulnerable to US military violence.

To note, there have been a few major changes in the Okinawan prostitution industry since the reversion. First, the end of Vietnam War led to a reduction in the number of American soldiers in Okinawa, and thus their demand for prostitutes has naturally declined. Second, especially since the 1980s, Filipino women have replaced Okinawan prostitutes serving the American soldiers. In fact, factors such as the economic growth of Okinawa, the improvement of the living standards of Okinawans, and the ¹² Researchers argue that Okinawa's economy today is characterized by three "K": kichi (military bases), kogyo koji (construction), and kankou (tourism). The US military contributes to the local economy by giving payments to landowners for the use of their land (63 billion yen was paid by the Japanese government on behalf of the United States in 1996), providing employment for the local people (more than 8,000 people in 1996), and purchasing local products (5.7% of the local GDP) (Hook and Siddle 2003, 3-8; also see Inoue 2007, 65-6).

depreciation of the US dollar vis-à-vis the Japanese yen have made Japanese prostitutes less affordable for Americans (Hayashi 2006, 13). Thus, while Okinawan prostitutes continue to service “more respectable customers,” i.e., Okinawan or Japanese men, more “affordable” Filipino prostitutes service the Americans in base towns (Inoue 2007, 67; Molasky 1999, 68, 113). As a result, the sexual interaction between Japanese prostitutes and American GIs has steadily decreased. Although the cases are not that frequent, instances of sexual violence against Okinawan women have nonetheless attracted much public attention, especially since 1995, as rape victims, especially young victims, have offered a perfect symbol for Okinawa’s historical humiliation, suffering, and victimhood. Elevated to the status of iconic characters, rape victims embody Okinawa’s tainted, violated, and humiliated political body. Okinawa is imagined and reimagined through these victimized women.

Official Discourse: From Defeated State to Independent Nation and Reliable Ally

Japan-US security arrangements have been integral to Japan’s national defense since an alliance was first formed between Japan and the United States in 1953. The arrangements allowing the US military to use military facilities and areas in Japan while obliging the United States to defend the hosting state have long served as a “pillar” of Japan’s defense policy. As an integral part of Japan’s defense system, Japan’s white papers describe these arrangements at length, thereby providing official Japanese accounts of Japan-US relations. Generally, these papers articulate the alliance as the foundation of the “partnership” between Japan and the United States, a form of relationship developed between two independent states that mutually support each other to achieve common security goals. That is, the alliance represents the “equal” relationship between Japan and the United States, whereby the security arrangements are shown to be a manifestation of Japan’s maturity and reveal its “macho” qualities as America’s strategic partner. More importantly, this description allows Japan to articulate itself as an independent and respectable self, thus also giving rise to a discursive boundary between Japan’s past self (as a loser of WWII) and its present self (an equal partner of the United States).

The discourse of “equal partnership” is at the core of the way the alliance is articulated in Japan’s white papers. This discourse is combined with other key representations of Japan as “independent,” “capable of acting of its own will,” and “responsible,” each of which serves to depict Japan as an honorable, masculine self that has achieved equal status in relation to the victor of the Pacific War.

For instance, Japan’s independence is symbolically represented in the explanations of the formation of the security alliance, which, white papers assert, was created on the basis of Japan’s own “desire” or “choice.” White Paper on Defense 2006 states: “When restoring independence after the end of World War II, Japan has decided to form an alliance with the United States and become a member of the Free World based on freedom and democracy, as Japan’s security strategy. This decision led to the prosperity and development of Japan since then” (MOD 2006, 212). Capable of making important decisions, Japan is presented as being able to act “of its own free will” and “independently” choosing its own path of security strategy through which it can achieve postwar prosperity and development. The alliance is indeed described as something that serves Japan’s security goals, i.e. developing a “watertight defense posture” while “not becoming a military power” that would pose a threat to neighboring states. The discourse of strategic choice, in this context, gives rise to a particular kind of Japanese subject. That is, Japan is independent, free of US influence, and pursuing its security interests by skillfully choosing a defense partner without any outside pressure or interference.

On the other hand, articulated as a strategic partner, the United States is depicted not only as a reliable military power, but also as a cooperative, rather than authoritative or commanding, state that pursues a shared interest in international peace and stability with Japan. It is repeatedly stated that the United States “shares with Japan the basic values and ideals of democracy, respect for freedom and human rights, and interests in the maintenance of peace and stability in the world” (MOD 2006, 213), and “also has a shared interest in the Asia-Pacific region” (MOD 2010, 271). These depictions represent Japan and the United States as sharing fundamental virtues and values, and their alliance comes to be interpreted as a form of “shared commitment” in regional peace and stability. In other words, “common security goals” as well as “shared ideals and principles” symbolically turn two entities differing in power and military capabilities into “equal partners” or even “comrades” in what is now presented as a horizontal relationship.

It is in this context of the alliance that US bases in Japan are presented as a linchpin of the “cooperative efforts” ensuing Japan’s safety and regional stability. The US military presence “serves as a deterrent against aggression towards Japan”; it enables “a swift Japan-U.S. joint response [...] in the event of an armed attack on Japan”; and it further “forms a foundation” for the additional assistance provided by “the reinforcement of other U.S. Forces” (MOD 2010, 272). The presence of the US military in Japan is thus understood largely from a strategic/functional point of view, and the foreign military is unproblematically given the part of safeguarding and ensuring Japan's territorial integrity from within Japan.

The papers further add that “while Article 5 of the Japan-U.S. Security Treaty stipulates the obligation of the United States to defend Japan, Article 6 allows for the use by the United States of facilities and areas in Japan for maintaining the security of Japan and international peace and security in the Far East, and overall Japan-U.S. obligations are kept in balance” (MOD 2010, 272-73). Reference to “a balance of obligation” is repeatedly made in the white papers. Such a balance is represented as a manifestation of “mutual commitment.” That is, by offering military bases to the United States and even paying US military expenses for maintaining their presence in Japan, Japan equally shares a burden with the United States and fulfills its responsibility as a reliable ally, instead of contributing nothing and totally relying on US efforts to defend Japan—like a son simply expecting the father to provide him with unconditional protection. Japan's “commitment,” therefore, means that Japan is a responsible and equal partner of the United States—Japan is not a US protectorate, a burden, or even a dependent child as it was during the Allied occupation.

In this respect, Okinawa, once again housing 75% of all US military areas in Japan, is depicted as a symbol of mutual commitment and equal partnership between Japan and the United States. The bases in Okinawa prove Japan's commitment to the alliance, while the presence of the US military there shows America's will to defend Japan and to stabilize the region. Okinawa considerably supports Japan-US joint efforts and thereby “contributes greatly not only to the security of Japan but also to the peace and stability of the Asia Pacific region” (MOD 2010, 274). Indeed, “in comparison to areas such as the U.S. mainland, Hawaii, and Guam, Okinawa is located close to countries in East Asia,” while “it has a certain distance from countries neighboring Japan” (MOD 2010, 274). US forces in Okinawa thus have the capacity to respond to contingencies in the region promptly and effectively, taking a decisive part in the security arrangements. By accommodating many American bases, Okinawa accordingly serves as a “fortress” for peace in Japan and the surrounding areas, or as a “peacekeeper” for the Asia-Pacific region.

A natural corollary to such a meaning given to US bases in Okinawa is that white papers are largely silent about the so-called Okinawa problem—a historical issue concerning the subordinate status of Okinawa vis-à-vis the United States. As mentioned earlier, the military presence of the United States in Okinawa is often regarded as a fundamental problem that suggests the unchanging reality of Japan as a defeated state and thus signifies the continued victimhood of Okinawa and, further, of Japan. However, since Okinawa is simply represented as a “strategic” place where many US military bases are located, if the presence of the US military causes any problem in Okinawa, the white papers recognize these merely as “social issues” resulting from the heavy concentration of military facilities there and/or the close proximity of residential and industrial areas to US bases. In other words, problems in Okinawa refer to the adverse influences of US military facilities on the living environment of the local people (e.g., noise, pollution, crimes, etc.), which, by nature, can be caused by any military base, including US military bases in other parts of Japan as well as facilities used by Japanese Self Defense Forces. In fact, issues in Okinawa are often mentioned as part of general issues arising between “people and defense facilities” (MOD 1990) where “harmony” is needed so that these bases can function adequately. If there is anything particular to Okinawa, therefore, it simply results from the densest concentration of military bases in Okinawa, where various social problems are just displayed more visibly than in other places. That is to say, there is no essential difference between the problems experienced by Okinawans and those experienced by other Japanese people living around US military bases in the main islands or around SDF bases.

Following the establishment of SACO (Special Action Committee on Okinawa) by Japan and the United States after the 1995 rape incident that heightened national awareness about the Okinawa problem, white papers have tended to pay greater attention to Okinawa, thus significantly increasing the references to issues that Okinawan people have long faced. Since 1997, white papers have often described the construction of US bases in Okinawa as a result of US military occupation and requisition of land, whereby these bases are presented as a “legacy of World War II.” Today, white papers more clearly recognize the great burden the presence of these bases has had on the local communities, and acknowledge an increasing need to address a range of issues concerning Okinawa.

Yet, the previous narration of problems in Okinawa has not fundamentally changed, and white papers continue to treat the problems as a series of technical issues that can be solved through additional agreements between Japan and the United States. Indeed, white papers show in detail the progress in the implementation of the SACO final report, including efforts to “realign, consolidate, and reduce” US military bases in Okinawa, to enforce measures to regulate the way military exercises are conducted, and to reduce the noise produced by these bases. These efforts are presented as part of Japan’s attempts to overcome the “Okinawa problem” and ultimately to create “harmony” between the US military and Okinawan local people.

Accordingly, this narrative erases the element of the Okinawa problem as the issue of compromised autonomy/sovereignty of Japan and of its relative weakness vis-à-vis the United States. While the US military has occupied a large part of Okinawa since the war, its presence is simply articulated as a source of noise, a hindrance to local development, and a potential hazard to people’s safety. In a way, official discourses construct the problem as that which is experienced at an individual or a communal level, thus having few implications for the nation as a whole. By doing so, even in the face of the so-called (localized) Okinawa problem, a contemporary Japanese self can still be articulated as one that has achieved a dramatic transformation in terms of its relationship with the United States and thus is competent to make arrangements with the US military to alter the situation in Okinawa. That is to say, through coping with Okinawa’s issues with the United States, Japan can even reproduce its “equal footing” status with this “partner” and, consequently, it can distance a contemporary Japan’s national self from a past self—an entity that was subjugated, occupied, and emasculated by the United States. Japan’s past is, therefore, given an identity that is distinct from a contemporary “independent” and “respectable” Japan.

This forgetting of the Okinawa problem as an issue that suggests Japan’s continued vulnerability vis-à-vis the United States is, however, disturbed by voices that treat the problem as a national issue that affects the autonomy and independence of Japan. According to these voices, American bases are neither the knots of the “partnership” between Japan and the United States, nor merely a source of social problems. They are rather symbols of Japan's continued subjugation and emasculation vis-à-vis the United States. When a vulnerable girl is assaulted and humiliated by a US GI, competing images of Japan are produced too, and they challenge the official accounts of equal partnership between the two states. In the following sections, I turn to one of those discursive sites where Okinawa is represented as a haunting shadow of Japan's own past as a result of the symbolic role played by an Okinawan girl raped by a US GI.

Repeated Crimes: The Rape of Okinawan School Girls

If official discourse represents Japan as an independent, masculine, and reliable ally of the United States, the discourses on the US military rape of Okinawan women can produce a powerful challenge to the official representation of Japan. Each incident committed against Okinawan women can give rise to a discursive space where alternative images of Japan are created and recreated, thus destabilizing the official discourse. The rape incident that took place in 2008 was one of such sites where a masculine Japan was called into question.

On February 11, 2008, a 14-year-old Japanese girl was raped by a US Marine in Chatan Town, Okinawa. The US Marine was immediately arrested outside a military base by the local police, but he denied raping the girl and only admitted that he had forced her down and kissed her. On February 29, the girl withdrew the charge against him, telling the prosecutor that she no longer intended to be involved in this case and wanted to be left alone.¹³ The Marine was released and turned over to the US Forces in Japan. The US military later tried him by court-martial, and the suspect finally confessed the crime and was found guilty.¹⁴

¹³ "Boko jiken, beihei wo shakuho: Okinawa shojo, kokuso torisage" [Rape Incident, US Soldier Released: Okinawan Girl Withdrew the Charge], Asahi Shinbun, 1 March, 2008.

This case aroused strong resentment against the US military, developing into a diplomatic crisis between the Japanese and US governments. In Okinawa and Tokyo, protest rallies were organized. The Okinawa protest, in particular, was attended by 6,000 people.¹⁵ Moreover, a number of prefectural and city assemblies in Okinawa and throughout mainland Japan passed a resolution to protest the act of the Marine and demanded US official apologies to the victim as well as the enforcement of strict military discipline.¹⁶ These resolutions also insisted on the reduction in the number of US military bases in order to protect the local people against crimes by US military personnel. Indeed, repeated crimes against the locals had proved the ineffectiveness of military discipline to prevent crimes. It was thus maintained that the fundamental solution to the repeated crimes would be a radical review of the US-Japan Status of Forces Agreement and a substantial reduction of US military facilities and personnel presence in Okinawa.

The incident was highly politicized while stirring up strong emotions on the part of the Japanese people. It reminded many Japanese of one of the most painful rape cases in Okinawa: the infamous “1995 rape incident” in which a 12-year-old Okinawan girl was abducted and gang-raped by three US GIs near Camp Hansen. After spending all day partying, these men plotted to “get a girl” and kidnapped a 12-year-old schoolgirl from the street. They bound her arms and legs, taped her eyes and mouth, and took her to a remote beach where they repeatedly beat, raped, and eventually left her. The suspects were quickly identified and arrested by the United States Naval Criminal Investigation Service at the request of Okinawa’s local police. However, the investigation was severely blocked by the SOFA. In Article XVII 5(c), the SOFA provides that “the custody of an accused member of the United States armed forces or the civilian component over whom Japan is to exercise jurisdiction shall, if he is in the hands of the United States, remain with the United States until he is charged by Japan.” This provision is often manipulated by US personnel who commit a crime in Japan and take refuge in US bases so as to escape legal punishment in Japan (Inoue 2007, 33). Once again, the 1995 rape case revealed the discriminatory nature of the SOFA and greatly increased Japanese anger against the US military. As many as 85,000 people assembled for a protest rally in Okinawa, the largest protest in Okinawan history.¹⁷ Many local assemblies also adopted a resolution to oppose the unfair treaty.¹⁸ This rape case eventually led to governmental negotiations for the reform of the Agreement, as a result of which Japan and the United States agreed to hand over a criminal of US origin to the Japanese police if he or she is accused of committing an atrocious crime (i.e., murder or rape).¹⁹ In the 1995 rape case, the suspects were, after being charged, handed over to the local authority and tried in Japanese courts. This case marked “the first such trial and conviction in the half century since the start of the U.S. occupation,” thus providing a critical moment of reflection about Japan-US relations (Angst 2003, 137). And yet, “the U.S. and Japanese governments did not forget to reassert the importance of the Security Treaty for the sake of ‘peace and prosperity’ of the Asia-Pacific region” (Inoue 2007, 34). The governments’ position intensified Okinawa’s indignation against the US military as well as the Japanese government.

¹⁴ “Bei gunpo kaigi: Beihei sabakenu jiken no hansei wo” [US Court Marshal: Reflect on the Incident That Could Not Be Tried], Ryukyu Shinpo, 17 May, 2008.

¹⁵ “Taishikan shuhen de shimin ra ga kogi” [Citizens Protested Around the Embassy], Asahi Shinbun, 14 February, 2008; “250 nin ga kogi shukai” [250 People Participated in a Protest Rally], Mainichi Shinbun, 13 February, 2008; “Beihei jiken: Kogi taikai ni 6000 nin: Okinawa Komei, 10 shi cho son shucho mo” [The US Military Incident: 6000 Participants in the Protest Rally: Okinawa Komei, 10 City, Town, and Village Mayors, Too], Mainichi Shinbun, 24 March, 2008.

¹⁶ Such a resolution was adopted, for instance, in Okinawa Prefectural Assembly, all city, town, and village assemblies in Okinawa, and many other assemblies in mainland Japan.

¹⁷ “8 man 5000 nin kogi shukai: Okinawa kichi shukusho motome ketsugi” [85,000 People Participated in a Protest Rally: Adopted a Resolution Demanding the Reduction of Bases], Yomiuri Shinbun, 22 October, 1995.

¹⁸ “35 chiho gikai minaoshi yokyu: Nichibei chii kyotei ketsugi ya ikensho” [35 Local Assemblies Demanding the Review: SOFA Resolutions and Statements], Yomiuri Shinbun, 28 September, 1995.

¹⁹ “Beigun yogisha: Judai jiken, kisomae hikiwatashi: Nichibei ga seishiki goi” [US Military Suspects: Heinous Crimes, Extradition Before Prosecution: Official Agreement Reached by Japan and the US], Yomiuri Shinbun, 26 October, 1995.

The rape case in 2008 was thought to demonstrate the unchanging nature of the US military (e.g., its brutality, militancy, and disrespect for the local people), and it again galvanized public opinion to demand that the Japanese government review the agreements legitimizing the US military presence and granting American soldiers privileged status in Japan. More importantly, the incident urged people to rethink “who we are” in relation to the US military that had stayed in Japan since WWII. This individual incident in Okinawa revealed the continued reality of Japan as a defeated nation. That is, Japan is still occupied by the victor of WWII and is still at the mercy of a foreign military that continues to treat Japan like a subject state.

In this context, the rape case carried symbolic weight, and the victim became a symbol of the continuing US victimization of Okinawa. In the media coverage of the incident, the rape of the Okinawan schoolgirl was not only politicized and discussed within a larger context of base issues in Okinawa, but it was also considered to be emblematic of 50 years of US oppression, subjugation, and victimization of Okinawa. Thus, the rape incident also represented the US violation of the Japanese body politic and, ultimately, its emasculation. At the same time, however, the victim was a symbol of Okinawa's victimhood vis-à-vis mainland Japan, which had sacrificed Okinawa to regain its independence and to become an ally of the United States. In this sense, the victim gave rise to Okinawa as Japan's internal other, an internal otherness that questioned and destabilized the idea and image of Japan's unified identity. The incident, thus, both reproduced and called into question the idea of a Japanese national self.

Media Discourses: The Rape of Okinawa and the Construction of a Feminized Okinawan Identity

The 2008 rape case provoked an immediate media response, making the front page of many Japanese national and local newspapers. These newspapers carried feature articles and editorials on the incident, which they commonly described as an abhorrent, atrocious, and unforgivable crime committed against a vulnerable teenage girl/child in Okinawa. The victimization of the young girl itself constituted an act of violence that not only hurt her body and heart, but also violated her dignity. The portrayal of the girl as a victim of the sexual assault would, accordingly, raise issues about women's/children's security and human rights, while, in the context of national imagination, it would also offer an iconographic image of Okinawa's historical subjugation and humiliation by the US military and perhaps even by mainland Japan. Placed within these particular discursive spaces, the rape incident could be shaped and reshaped into a variety of symbols that could produce different political and ethical outcomes. Further, it would construct various Japanese subjective identities vis-à-vis the United States and Okinawa as Japan's otherness. A broad public debate about the rape thus opened up a critical space where powerful counter discourses were produced and reproduced to challenge the official discourse and to problematize the official narratives about the historical transformation of Japan into an equal partner of the United States.

The media narrative of the rape case first told the story of a pitiful teenage girl in Okinawa who had been brutally assaulted by a US Marine. On the night of February 10, 2008, three junior high school girls were approached by a US Marine and offered a ride home. The Marine “skillfully” talked one of the girls into riding his motorcycle with him and took her home. Forced to have a sex with him, the girl “cried” and “tried to run away,” but the Marine “chased” and eventually “raped” her inside his car. Strong sympathy for the girl was manifest in the newspaper narratives. Indeed, the editorials tended to tell the story from the victim’s point of view and to graphically depict her intense fear, anger, and deep suffering. The Okinawa Taimuzu wrote: “It is reported that the girl felt there was something strange about the suspect’s behavior and asked her friend for help on her cellular phone when he was off guard. It is unbearable to imagine her scream for help and her tense demeanor and fear suggested by her words such as ‘[he is] coming’ and ‘I can’t get off his car.’”²⁰ The empathy with the victim was especially prominent after she withdrew a charge against the rapist. The Asahi Shinbun stated: “This incident is extremely regrettable considering the psychological trauma the girl experienced as a result of this American soldier’s selfish behavior. How scary it was for her to be with this American soldier. She must have felt deep chagrin and resentment at him when she was taken into protected custody. The girl, nevertheless, dropped her accusation. This decision shows how a sex crime rips a woman apart.”²¹

²⁰ “Beihei boko jiken: Naze konzetsu dekinainoka” [The US Military Rape Incident: Why We Can’t Eradicate], Okinawa Taimuzu, 13 February, 2008.

The vivid depiction of her fear, mortification, grief, anger, and physical and psychological wounds would conjure up the iconographic image of a “naïve,” “innocent,” and “pure” teenage girl tragically victimized by an aggressive American soldier. She was only 14 years old and became a victim of rape. The editorials emphasized the atrocity of the incident by underlying the victim’s youth and immaturity that rendered her extremely vulnerable to a crime like this. Indeed, the editorials commonly referred to the victim as a “girl” rather than a “woman” or a “rape casualty,” and called the incident an “assault on a (school) girl” instead of an “assault on a woman,” a term generally used to talk about rape in the Japanese media.

The representation of the incident as a sexual assault on a teenage girl gave rise to an urgent need to reconsider issues regarding the provision of security for women and children in Okinawa. Rape, first and foremost, constitutes a serious human rights violation, which “strips a victim of her dignity and the life that could have been more joyful.”²² Thus, when narrated as an individual sexual crime, this rape incident would invoke the responsibility of the society never to let a crime like this happen again on Okinawan soil. In other words, it was claimed that effective preventive measures must be developed against recurrent crimes by US troops in order to protect Okinawan women and children from danger. The Japanese nation must also urge US Forces in Japan to strengthen military discipline and control soldiers who “could act on instinct and wait for a chance to assault women.”²³ “What we all are seeking for,” the Okinawa Taimuzu stressed, “is not repeated words of apology but peaceful lives where there is no worry about our children being involved in such a loathsome crime as this one, with the guarantee of day-to-day safety.”²⁴

²¹ “Beihei shakuho: Soredemo jiken ha kienai” [The US Soldier Released: Still Incidents Will Never Disappear], Asahi Shinbun, 2 March, 2008.

²² “Nanpuroku” [Nonpuroku Colum], Minami Nihon Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

When the victim withdrew the charge against the Marine, the issue of increasing the protection of women and children further shifted to the question of how society could support rape victims and provide them with thoughtful care. In the Japanese judicial system, a rape is a crime that requires the victim to bring an accusation against the rapist so he can be prosecuted. The victim, thus, needs to command extraordinary courage to report an incident to the police and to describe in detail the rape in court. This hurts and demeans the victim even more deeply and further compounds her miseries. As the Asahi Shinbun noted, “many [victims of rape and indecent assaults] choose to bear silently, hoping to forget as soon as possible rather than to be asked for details [of their incidents]. Some decide to drop charges after filing, because they no longer want to get hurt.”²⁵ In this rape case, the victim was also exposed to popular curiosity/interest aroused by the media, which also invited some criticism toward her for being “unguarded” and “not cautious enough.” Some editorials challenged such a view by maintaining that “it must not be the victim but the offender who is to blame [for the rape],”²⁶ and that “even if she had been more cautious, the rape would not have been prevented.”²⁷ Yet, more fundamentally, the editorials invoked the structural problem that lay in the lack of legal protection and social support for the victim and led her to reach the decision not to prosecute the crime. As some pointed out, there occurred a “second damage”²⁸ or a “second rape,”²⁹ which society should have prevented but did not stop. This case, thus, confronted Japan with not only the issue of how to best protect “its” women, particularly young girls, from the danger of (sexual) violence, but also with “how we could support victims of crimes of this kind.”³⁰

²³ “Joshi chugakusei boko: Yurusenai beihei no hido: ‘Saihatsu boshi’ ha kuchisaki dakeka” [The Rape of a Junior High School Girl: An Unforgivable Evil Act of a US Soldier: Is the “Prevention of Repeating Crimes” Only a Lip Service?], Ryukyu Shinpo, 13 February, 2008.

²⁴ “Beihei boko jiken: Naze konzetsu dekinainoka” [The US Military Rape Incident: Why We Can’t Eradicate], Okinawa Taimuzu, 13 February, 2008.

²⁵ “Beihei shakuho: Soredemo jiken ha kienai” [The US Soldier Released: Still Incidents Will Never Dissappear], Asahi Shinbun, 2 March, 2008.

In short, when this incident was construed as a crime committed against an individual girl, the media discourse legitimately addressed the issue of protecting Okinawan women and thereby problematized Japanese society where effective measures were not taken to protect and support them. Thus, by narrating a crime against a teenage girl, media discourse also constructed the incident as one kind of women’s issues, more specifically the issue of women’s security and human rights, which, by requiring protection for them, invoked the image of a paternalistic Japanese self who should/would take the responsibility for the safety of “its” women.

²⁶ “Jiken no kyokun ikashite koso: Beihei fukiso” [Need to Learn Lessons from the Incident: The Charge Dropped Against the US Soldier], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 2 March, 2008.

²⁷ “Beihei shakuho: Soredemo jiken ha kienai” [The US Soldier Released: Still Incidents Will Never Disappear], Asahi Shinbun, 2 March, 2008.

²⁸ “Kokuso torisage: Higaisha no koe ni kotaeru michi ha” [The Charge Withdrew: Is There a Way to Listen to the Victim?], Okinawa Taimuzu, 2 March, 2008.

²⁹ “Kokuso torisage: Hanzai no yogi ha kienai” [The Charge Withdrew: The Suspicion of a Crime Does Not Fade Away], Ryukyū Shinpo, 2 March, 2008.

³⁰ “Jiken no kyokun ikashite koso: Beihei fukiso” [Need to Learn Lessons from the Incident: The Charge Dropped Against the US Soldier], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 2 March, 2008.

More interestingly, for the purpose of the present study, the editorials soon replaced the story of the “pitiful young girl” with that of a “historically victimized Okinawa.” They started to shift the narrative of the incident from sexual violence against a particular young girl to broader political and historical issues concerning Okinawa. Indeed, gradually, the victimized girl was given extra symbolic weight as a “victim of historical violence by the US military.” More precisely, the rape was understood to have occurred not simply because of the rapist’s aggressive behavior, but fundamentally also because of the presence of US bases on Okinawa. In Okinawa, people living around US military bases had been occasionally victimized by US GIs. Rapes and attempts to rape by US military personnel and their families occurred in 2000, 2001, 2002, 2004, 2005, and 2007.³¹ And, of course, the 1995 case mentioned above was still present in many people’s minds. This time, once again, a young girl would be sexually assaulted and humiliated by an American Marine. Many editorials wrote that “again, a loathsome crime has happened,”³² and they asked “why is such an unforgivable sexual crime committed again and again?”³³ “Until when will we let such a tragedy be repeated?”³⁴ As long as there were US military bases in Okinawa, they claimed, accidents and incidents involving the US military would occur and cause harm to Okinawan people.

³¹ “Joshi chugakusei boko: Yurusenai beihei no hido: ‘Saihatsu boshi ha kuchisaki dakeka’ [The Rape of a Junior High School Girl: An Unforgivable Evil Act of a US Soldier: Is the “Prevention of Repeating Crimes” Only a Lip Service?], Ryukyū Shinpo, 13 February, 2008; “Beihei boko jiken: Naze konzetsu dekinainoka” [The US Military Rape Incident: Why We Can’t Eradicate], Okinawa Taimuzu, 13 February, 2008.

³² “Okinawa baihei jiken: Kyoko wo nidoto okosaseruna” [The Okinawa US Military Incident: Don’t Let Them Repeated Crimes], Mainichi Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

³³ “Beihei shojo boko: Okinawa no gaman mo genkai da” [The US Military Rape of a Girl: The Limit of Okinawa’s Patience Has Been Reached], Asahi Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

³⁴ “Beihei boko jiken: Higeiki wo itsumade kurikaesu” [The US Military Incident: Until When the Tragedy Is Repeated?], Niigata Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

“For 63 years, Okinawa has been left with the excessive burden of US bases,”³⁵ another editorial stated. It was at this point that the rape victim came to signify Okinawa and its history of victimization. Just like the girl, Okinawa had been repeatedly humiliated by the US military. During World War II, Okinawa was turned into a battlefield by the United States, and since then, its people had been forced to live alongside US bases and to suffer from the continued victimization by US forces. The Kumamoto Nichinichi Shinbun, for example, described a girl in a famous picture taken during the Battle of Okinawa and created an association between the rape victim and the girl in the picture.³⁶ In the picture, a small girl in tatters is carrying a white flag in her hand and walking toward American GIs with frightened eyes. The editorial stated: “Even though times are different, both war and violence always crush girls.” As the Battle of Okinawa victimized the local population, including the girl in the picture, the ongoing violence by US troops had produced a number of young female victims in Okinawa. The editorial continued: “Although more than 60 years have passed, our children and grandchildren are still humiliated by American soldiers. Nothing could be more painful than this.” “The US military considers Okinawa their colony,”³⁷ a local resident stated, thus suggesting Okinawa’s continued sense of victimization by the United States. As the Ehime Shinbun wrote, trained to be soldiers whose mission is to kill enemies, those

³⁵ “Joshi chugakusei boko: Yurusenai beihei no hido: ‘Saihatsu boshi’ ha kuchisaki dakeka” [The Rape of a Junior High School Girl: An Unforgivable Evil Act of a US Soldier: Is the “Prevention of Repeating Crimes” Only a Lip Service?], Ryukyu Shinpo, 13 February, 2008.

³⁶ “Shinsemen: Okinawa • chugakusei boko jiken” [Shinsemen Colum: The Okinawa Junior High School Student Rape Incident], Kumamoto Nichinichi Shinbun, 14 February, 2008.

³⁷ “Beihei boko jiken: Saihatsu boshi he no taisaku to tettei wo hakare” [The US Military Rape Incident: Take Countermeasures Against Repeating Crimes and Make Them Work], Ehime Shinbun, 15 February, 2008.

American troops must have become “insensitive” to the suffering of others and come to feel no sympathy toward Okinawans in general.³⁸

In this context, the rape case became construed as a manifestation of the so-called Okinawa problem or the continued subjugation and victimization of Okinawa. In this respect, Okinawa was also represented as a victim, a victim of World War II, and a victim of repeated crimes by the US military. Identified as a victim, the suffering of the victimized girl came to be linked to the suffering of Okinawa as a whole, and the anger of the girl became the anger of Okinawa. Through the body of an Okinawa girl, Okinawa had also been “hurt,” “humiliated,” “sacrificed,” and “victimized.” The raped girl herself represented Okinawa, and the Okinawan body politic was symbolized in the body of the raped girl.

Symbolized by a raped girl, then, Okinawa’s identity was constructed in relation to Okinawa’s aggressor or the victimizing US military. While the US military was depicted as “apathetic,” “arrogant,” “dishonest,” “immoral,” “unruly,” and “wild,” Okinawa was conversely given such attributes as “peaceful,” “gentle,” “naive,” “sensitive,” and “vulnerable.” That is to say, constructed vis-à-vis the “hyper-masculine” other, Okinawa became “feminized.” Okinawa too was a raped woman. Indeed, sexual rhetoric was used in one of the editorials to describe the US bases issues in Okinawa. Referring to the metaphor used by a former US Defense Department official who had compared Okinawa’s housing of many US military bases with a basket carrying too many eggs, the Asahi Shinbun indicated that American soldiers originating from these “eggs” had come out to commit crimes and humiliated the (motherland) basket.³⁹ From a historical viewpoint, it could be said that these eggs are in fact the product of the wartime invasion/rape of Okinawa by the US military, which imposed the burden of taking care of their “boys” even after Okinawa was returned to the Japanese family.

³⁸ “Chijjiku: Okinawa beihei no hanzai” [Chijjiku Colum: US Military Crimes in Okinawa], Ehime Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

In this context, some editorials even considered that, if Okinawa was a feminized part of Japan, such a feminized part emasculated Japan as a whole, particularly since Japan had not fully played the role of guardian or father for Okinawa. Okinawa was indeed a constitutive part of Japan. The Okinawa problem was not simply “Okinawa’s problem,” but “Japan’s own problem.” Thus, the Japanese government would have to fulfill its responsibility to protect Okinawa from foreign danger. Many editorials urged the government to show fortitude by negotiating with the United States and earnestly working on the bases issues. Still, other editorials were not very optimistic about the government’s ability to improve the situation in Okinawa. In fact, despite the government’s repeated request to US Forces for the enforcement of military discipline, rapes and other crimes had been repeatedly committed by US personnel. Some argued that the government did not seem ready for drastic reforms to the Status of Forces Agreement with the United States because this might undermine the partnership between Japan and the United States. As the Kumamoto Nichinichi Shinbun noted, Japan “cannot even protect a girl.”⁴⁰ It is in this context that the rape incident as “a particular sexual crime of violence against a young girl” had been transformed into “a crisis of sovereignty” (Angst 2003, 138).

³⁹ “Tensei jingo” [Tenseijingo Colum], Asahi Shinbun, 13 February 2008.

⁴⁰ “Shinsemen: Okinawa • chugakusei boko jiken” [Shinseimen Colum: The Okinawa Junior High School Student Rape Incident], Kumamoto Nichinichi Shinbun, 14 February, 2008.

And yet, this incident would also suggest the unfair structure of Japanese society. As already noted, 75% of US military bases in Japan are “concentrated on Okinawa, which accounts for only 0.6% of the Japanese territory.”⁴¹ The Tokyo Shinbun importantly noted that the Japan-US alliance, although it was supposed to ensure the peace and security of the “Japanese nation,” had rather given Okinawans a sense of fear and insecurity.⁴² That is to say, the rape incident had actually shown that Japanese “national security” was achieved through the “insecurity of Okinawa,” particularly of Okinawan girls/women. In this picture, Okinawa was not included in the Japanese nation. Okinawa was rather Japan’s sacrifice. In this way, Okinawa was given a distinct identity in relation to the Japanese national self. As a result, Okinawa also started to problematize the idea of a unitary Japanese self that had one history, one people, and one common experience. Rather, it showed that Japan was divided and had many histories and experiences. It suggested that Okinawa remained Japan’s prostituted daughter, who would continue to tell a different story about Japan’s so-called glorious reconstruction after WWII. That is, Japan had achieved reconstruction and security by “selling” Okinawa to the United States, maintaining the structural subjugation of Okinawa within Japanese society, and depriving Okinawans of a peaceful life. Okinawa, by contrast, would continue to ask: Is Japan really an equal partner vis-à-vis the United States? Has Japan really overcome the legacy of the war?

⁴¹ “Joshi chugakusei boko: Yurusenai beihei no hido: ‘Saihatsu boshi’ ha kuchisaki dakeka” [The Rape of a Junior High School Girl: An Unforgivable Evil Act of a US Soldier: Is the “Prevention of Repeating Crimes” Only a Lip Service?], Ryukyu Shinpo, 13 February, 2008.

⁴² “Okinawa shojo boko: Kurikaeshita beihei no yahi” [The Rape of an Okinawan Girl: Repeated Brutal Acts of the US Military], Tokyo Shinbun, 13 February, 2008.

Thus, many of the discourses about Okinawa show that Japan is still living as a victim of the war and that peace-loving Japan can exist and claim an identity/self only as a result of the internal victimization of Okinawa. The 2008 rape case in Okinawa would thus reveal another reality about Japan: Japan's postwar struggle had not ended in Okinawa.

Conclusion

Since the defeat in the Pacific War, to put an end to the postwar situation in which Japan was treated as a defeated, occupied, and dependent state, and to regain international acceptance, particularly by the United States, as a respectable state have been long-cherished desires for Japan. The key to realize these wishes was the development of an equal partnership alliance between Japan and the United States and the reversion of Okinawa to Japan. While the new Japan-US security pact of 1960 allowed Japan to remove some unfair clauses and significantly improve its relations with the United States, more critical to the opening of a new era was the unification of Okinawa in 1972. Indeed, the reversion was supposed to end the victor-loser relationship by formally terminating the postwar occupation of a part of the Japanese territory. Becoming an "undivided" whole again, Japan would be able to cooperate with the United States as an independent state and as a truly equal partner.

However, as a result of the reversion, Japan incorporated the "last vestige of the Pacific War" and was thereby brought to yet another phase of the postwar era. In fact, if mainland Japan's postwar had really ended, Okinawa's postwar had actually started when 30 years of US occupation came to an end. Further, as the reversion was achieved in return for the consent given to the continued military presence of the United States in Okinawa, Japan came to integrate the “islands of US military bases” and thus subsumed a symbol of lingering US power and of Japanese subjugation to the United States into its internal space. In this sense, as a consequence of ending the US occupation of Okinawa, Japan rather became stuck in the ongoing postwar reality. That is, the uninterrupted presence of US bases—which now serve as the “foundation of the Japan-US partnership”—effectively destabilizes the boundaries between the previous Japanese self as a loser and subjugated nation and the contemporary Japanese identity that hopes to posit Japan as an equal partner of the United States.

Once again, this points to Okinawa’s peculiar position in Japan-US relations. On the one hand, official discourses tell us that US bases in Okinawa are symbols of the Japan-US alliance and pillars of the Japanese defense system. In official discourses, Japan is indeed articulated as an independent, responsible, and equal partner of the United States. Japan can display an honorable masculine identity that has overcome the victor-loser relationship with regard to the United States. On the other hand, when we look at Okinawa-US relations through societal issues and discourses, particularly discourses on US military rapes of Okinawan girls, it is revealed that public and media discourses construct US bases in Okinawa as symbols of Japan’s subordination and emasculation vis-à-vis the mighty and dominant United States. In this respect, the “Okinawa problem” goes straight to the question of Japan’s identity in the postwar era.

This chapter has thus shown that Japan remains an unsettled subject/self. A series of competing discourses variously produce and reproduce what Japan is and is not. Through strengthening the alliance, Japan increasingly reasserts its masculine identity.

Yet, as long as Japan maintains its alliance with the United States, Japan will still be haunted by the “Okinawa problem,” which keeps reminding Japan that its postwar era has not ended and that Japan and the United States have never been equal partners. In a way, Okinawa embodies Japan’s past self: a defeated, occupied, and emasculated image of Japan. And Okinawa thus keeps on bringing back the “living ghost” of Japan’s own past that official discourses try to master and domesticate, but never successfully or completely.

As symbols not just of Okinawa but also of subjugated and emasculated Japan, raped Okinawan girls keep on questioning the equal partnership between Japan and the United States. They also call into question the unitary Japanese self that speaks on behalf of Okinawa. Okinawa, therefore, lies at the heart of Japan’s national imagination of its self and identity. Okinawa simultaneously constitutes and problematizes the Japanese self.

It is in this context that Japan always needs to reassert the renewed image of itself as an equal partner of the United States and thus as having an identity distinct from the emasculated self of the past. Through foreign policy, Japan has to reproduce the reality of an independent, masculine, and respectable Japan and, thereby, to cast away this emasculated image. However, it is an ongoing struggle against an anxiety about the feminine self that inhabits the Japanese national self. As a living ghost of Japan’s own past, Okinawa remains a critical point in Japan’s identity politics. It is a site where Japan is brought back to the reality of being a defeated state and where, nevertheless, it insists on creating the temporal boundaries between a new Japan and an old Japan.

V. THE COMFORT WOMEN ISSUE AND THE DISCURSIVE CONSTRUCTION OF “POSTWAR JAPAN”

The issue of comfort women has been a source of great controversy in Japan for decades. “Comfort women” (ianfu in Japanese) generally refers to those women who were drafted as sexual laborers for the Japanese Imperial Military before and during World War II. A significant number of women from Japan, Korea, China, Taiwan, Indonesia, the Netherlands, and the Philippines served the Japanese Imperial Forces at so-called “comfort stations” established not only in Japan but also throughout Asia and the South Pacific. Neither military prostitution nor wartime sexual violence is unique to Japan (Enloe 1990, Chapter 4; Hicks 1995, 28-32; Niarchos 2006, 274-89; Moon 1997; Stiglmayer 1994; Y. Tanaka 2002). However, the wartime Japanese comfort women system is distinct by virtue of imperial Japan’s “governmental initiative in establishing the mechanism and apparatus that the government authorities systematically and methodically carried out” (Oh 2001, 4). Thus, the comfort women phenomenon represents not a series of regrettable acts by individual soldiers during wartime, but rather a system of state-sanctioned and organized rape.

With the rise of comfort women movements at national, regional and international levels in the early 1990s, this wartime comfort system has gained widespread attention and has become a target of international criticism. Resolutions demanding Japan’s sincere apologies and compensation to former comfort women have been passed not only in states that had once been victimized by imperial Japan, but also in North America and Europe.⁴³ At the United Nations, the problem of the comfort women has been a repeated topic of discussion since 1992.⁴⁴ Various UN organs have passed resolutions and recommendations, while also issuing reports on the topic, including the much talked about Coomaraswamy (1996) and McDougall (1998) Reports. These reports identify the Japanese comfort women system as “sexual slavery” and indicate that the acts committed by imperial Japan constitute gross violations of international law that amount to “crimes against humanity.” Based on this understanding, Coomaraswamy explicitly states that Japan is obligated to acknowledge its violations of international law, to express an official apology, to provide legal compensation for individual women, to fully disclose historical documents concerning the comfort women system, to develop awareness of the issue among Japanese people through formal education, and, if possible, to punish the perpetrators.

In Japan, the question of comfort women has provoked considerable debate throughout the nation, generating various discourses about these women and postwar Japan. The Japanese government did issue several proclamations to apologize to former comfort women, including the statements delivered by Chief Cabinet Secretary Kato Koichi (1992), Chief Cabinet Secretary Kono Yohei (1993), and Prime Minister Murayama Tomiichi (1994). In these statements, the Japanese government publicly recognized the involvement of the government in establishing and managing comfort stations and formally expressed regret and remorse for the acts committed by imperial Japan against the comfort women. In order to support the victims financially and medically, the government instituted the Asian Peace and Friendship Foundation for Women (AWF) in 1995, through which Japan launched national atonement projects. Such an official stance, on the other hand, also invited a nationalist backlash. Many conservative politicians and commentators questioned the forced recruitment of comfort women and denied Japan's responsibility for this matter (Fujioka 1996; Hata 1999; Kobayashi 1997). Even cabinet members have publicly called comfort women "prostitutes" and claimed that the Japanese military did not forcibly draft these women (Nishino 2008, 51n28; Omori and Kawada 2010, 29, 48-9). The government did not negate these remarks but rather let them go, although all successive administrations formally inherited the official stance explained in the previously issued government statements. Today, this issue remains highly controversial in Japan, especially in the context of depictions of the war in history textbooks (Nishino 2005; Omori and Kawada 2010, Chapter 3). The government's ambiguous and even contradictory behavior further invites intense debates on this topic, while also giving momentum to comfort women movements worldwide.

⁴³ For example, resolutions concerning comfort women have been passed in United States (House of Representatives 2007; House Committee of International Relations 2006), Canada (House of Commons 2007), the Netherlands (House of Representatives 2007), European Parliament (2007), Taiwan (Legislative Yuan 2002, 2008), the Philippines (House Committee of Foreign Affairs 2005, 2008; House Committee of Human Rights 1999), United Kingdom (House of Commons 2008), and Korea (2003, 2008).

⁴⁴ The issue has been discussed in, for instance, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, the Commission on the Status of Women workshop (NGO), and the UN Fourth World Conference on Women.

The question of comfort women concerns Japan's national pride and carries grave implications for Japan's identity in the postwar era. Indeed, the comfort women issue brings up fundamental identity questions for Japan such as "who we were," "who we wish we had never been," "who we really are," and "who we might become," questions whose answers may construct Japan's political subjectivities and historical trajectories toward becoming a moral state/subject/self (Weber 2006). These questions play a key part in the definition of “postwar Japan,” which wants to define itself not as a continuation of “wartime militarist Japan,” but rather as a distinct entity incompatible with what it once was. In other words, the unsettled issue of the comfort women confronts Japan with its haunting legacy once again, but simultaneously offers Japan an opportunity to reimagine itself in contrast to its “past self.”

There is yet another important dimension of the comfort women issue that greatly concerns Japanese political identity. An often overlooked aspect of the comfort women issue is that sexual servants were also recruited in Japan, with native Japanese women serving the same role as those recruited abroad. Nevertheless, not only activists but also Japanese officials generally represent the issue as existing between Japan and former victim nations, neglecting the existence of comfort women of Japanese origin (Yamashita 2009, 279-82). In fact, no Japanese comfort women were entitled to receive compensation from the AWF, which was established to atone and provide support for the former comfort women of victimized nations. In other words, the official narrative of the comfort women problem constitutes the issue as a “diplomatic question” or a “question of foreign policy” by making it an issue between Japan and those who are not part of it. This means that the comfort women problem actually helps reconstruct Japan’s spatial boundaries with the “outside” and thereby reproduce Japan’s political self that is clearly distinguished from “foreign others.”

In this sense, comfort women are a source of imagination, that is to say, a way to imagine Japan’s own self in contrast to the other. Official discourse performatively reproduces Japan in relation to “subjugated Asia” that is symbolically represented by “former comfort women.” By apologizing to these women, however, government statements also recreate Japan as a new entity different from, and incompatible with, “wartime militarist Japan.” The comfort women problem, therefore, serves to constitute not only spatial boundaries between Japan and Asia, but also temporal ones between wartime Japan and postwar Japan. Contemporary Japan is thus produced as a distinct political subject that is rebuilt out of Japan’s great tragedy of the 20th century.

In this chapter, through an analysis of various discourses about comfort women, I will evaluate how “postwar Japan” is performatively constructed as a moral subject/identity in relation to both a geographical other (Asia) and a temporal other (wartime Japan). I will examine both official and unofficial texts to explore the broad political debate on this issue. Official government documents examined here include statements by prime ministers and chief cabinet secretaries about the comfort women issue. Statements made by the AWF will also be read as part of the official discourse. To collect official documents relevant to this question, I used the archive of Digital Museum: The Comfort Women Issue and the Asian Women’s Fund, an online museum established by the AWF to keep a record of its projects. In addition to documents issued by AWF itself, this archive includes statements by prime ministers, chief cabinet secretaries, and other government officials as well as resolutions and an official survey report on this problem, all of which have afforded a basis for AWF activity. The English translations of the documents quoted in this paper were also obtained from this museum archive.

For the analysis of wider societal discourses, national and local newspaper editorials discussing the comfort women issue will be analyzed. In order to evaluate the extent of changing societal discourses, I will look at the newspaper editorials published between 1992 and 1993 and in 2007. These years are chosen to explain the rise of competing discourses in Japanese society. The period between 1992 and 1993 is when the government published a series of official proclamations about the comfort women issue. While the Japanese public was generally sympathetic to the former comfort women around this time, nationalistic reaction gradually intensified in the late 1990s. The opposition culminated in 2007 when the US House of Representatives passed a resolution blaming Japan for poorly dealing with the comfort women issue. The analysis of these two periods will show conflicting discourses that constitute various Japanese subjectivities in relation to the comfort women.

Before looking into discourses about the comfort women issue, I will briefly explain the historical background of the problem. I will also analyze how particular discourses make comfort women a political problem. After closely reading official discourses, I will conclude this chapter by arguing that the comfort women issue is exactly the site where the identity of “reborn Japan” is performatively constituted, thereby providing a condition of possibility for the idea/image of Japan as a moral state in the postwar era.

Problematizing the Comfort Women System

It was in the early 1990s that the question of comfort women became a subject of political debate in Japan. After nearly 50 years of silence, the Japanese government finally recognized the comfort women problem as a forgotten legacy of the past involving Japan’s relations to former victim nations. Researchers provide a number of explanations for Japan’s long silence. For example, it is said that Japan did not problematize the comfort system because: abnormality is a feature of war; both military prostitution and rape are common in war; former comfort women wanted to hide their shameful experiences; victims' states also wanted to avoid exposing their shame of not having been able to protect their women; the US occupation forces took over the comfort women system for their own sexual needs; the US military also raped many Japanese women during and after the war (as we saw in Chapter IV); and there were many local collaborators who helped recruit comfort women in victimized Asian states (Soh 2008; Y. Tanaka 2002; Ueno 2004).

However, 50 years after the war, the issue of comfort women was finally brought up by South Korea, where public awareness of the Japanese comfort women system grew rapidly in the late 1980s. In South Korea, following 30 years of dictatorial rule that ended in 1987, feminist scholarship and activism gained momentum alongside wider democratic movements (Soh 1996; Tsutsui 2006). Influenced and supported by international feminist activism, Korean women's groups sparked popular interest in sexual violence against women, including the wartime Japanese comfort system that had humiliated a substantial number of young Korean women.⁴⁵ The rise of these groups led to the foundation in November 1990 of the Korean Council for Women Drafted for Sexual Slavery by Japan, an activist umbrella organization for the comfort women problem.

Against this background, during South Korean President Roh Tae Woo's visit to Japan in May 1990, the South Korean Foreign Ministry requested official records of wartime labor draftees, including comfort women. Acceding to the demand, Japan provided South Korea with a list of draftees, which did not yield any critical evidence of the system of forced prostitution (Oh 2001, 15). After Roh's visit, the issue of the comfort women was raised occasionally in the Japanese Diet. When Motooka Shoji, a member of the Socialist Party, demanded an official investigation of the comfort women issue in the Diet Budget Committee in June 1990, the Japanese government stated that the comfort women had been taken around with the military by "private entrepreneurs" (AWF n.d.a). This statement outraged Korean activists further. In 1991, a Korean woman testified for the first time in public that she had been forced to serve the Japanese military as a comfort woman. Later in the same year, three former Korean comfort women filed lawsuits against Japan in the Tokyo District Court demanding a formal apology and individual compensation. This led to the eventual politicization of the wartime comfort women system and pushed Japan to define its responsibility toward these women.

⁴⁵ Korean comfort women are said to account for 80% of the entire comfort women serving the Japanese Imperial Army (Mendoza 2003, 249; Oh 2001, 9-10).

As a result of these events, the comfort women issue had become a subject of contentious debate in Japan. Not only in the National Diet, but also in the academic setting, the problem had become an important topic of conversation and discussion. This does not mean, however, that the existence of comfort women was unknown to, or hidden from, the Japanese people up until that point. Since the end of the war, there had been hundreds of publications in Japan referring to the comfort women issue, including biographies, memoirs, magazine articles, and nonfiction books (Oh 2001, 15; Soh 2008, 146-59; Yamashita 2009, 273-74). Several films concerning the comfort women have also been made since the 1970s.⁴⁶ Even in comparison with Korean publications, "the Japanese literature has encompassed a wider range of viewpoints, dealing not only with war veterans' intimate memoirs of their encounters at comfort facilities and the personal stories of former comfort women, but also with humanitarian and socially critical works sympathizing with the plight of the exploited women of colonial Korea” (Soh 2008, 146). Nevertheless, this issue was not politicized until around 1990. Chizuko Ueno (2004, 69) notes: “Even though the fact of the military comfort women was on occasion raised as an issue after the war, this never went beyond regarding the women as wretched or pitiful, and was naturalized as the kind of cruelty or ‘going too far’ that accompanies war, or even as a sacrifice to male lust.” Simply put, it was mostly a matter of popular discussion, not of foreign policy.

⁴⁶ For instance, there were films such as Jugun ianfu (1974), Okinawa no harumori: Shogen—Jugun ianfu (1979), Senso daughters (1989).

In the face of worsening diplomatic relations between Japan and South Korea, and faced with developing Japanese women’s activism mounting evidence from scholars along with intense media coverage of the issue, Japanese Prime Minister Miyazawa Kiichi apologized for the first time to the South Korean President in January 1992, recognizing the involvement of the Japanese military in establishing comfort stations (Omori and Kawada 2010, 9). The Japanese government also formally conducted investigations of the comfort women question, the results of which were released in July 1992, together with a statement by Chief Cabinet Secretary Kato Koichi. The reports acknowledged governmental involvement in constructing and managing comfort stations, although forcible recruitment was not confirmed. Thus, the Japanese government did not explore the possibility of legal compensation, even though more women launched lawsuits against Japan. Lawsuits were now being filed not only by Korean women, but also by Filipino (and later by Dutch and Chinese) women, indicating the widening impact of the comfort women issue.

The second survey report was published in August 1993. The report concluded that many comfort women were recruited against their will (Naikaku kanbo gaisei shingi shitsu 1993). Chief Cabinet Secretary Kono Yohei, who succeeded Kato in December 1992, delivered a statement that the government confirmed that “in many cases they [comfort women] were recruited against their own will, through coaxing, coercion, etc., and that, at times, administrative/military personnel directly took part in the recruitments,” even if the recruitment “was conducted mainly by private recruiters who acted in response to the request of the military” (Kono 1993).

Murayama Tomiichi took the position of prime minister in June 1994, following relatively short administrations led by Hata Tsutomu and Hosokawa Morihiro after Miyazawa. In 1995, Murayama established the Asian Peace and National Foundation for Women (AWF), a private foundation through which Japan would fulfill its moral responsibility toward former comfort women. For Murayama, this fund was “an expression of atonement on the part of the Japanese people toward these women,” and it would provide support for them through medical, welfare, and other projects (Murayama 1995). The establishment of the Fund meant that in practice the Japanese government abandoned direct governmental compensation for individual women. Indeed, the dominant opinion of the government was “that the issues of reparation, material restitution and the right to claim compensation for events in the war had already been dealt with by the San Francisco Peace Treaty, bilateral treaties and other relevant accords,” and that “for this reason, Japan could not offer compensation to individuals” (AWF n.d.b). Accordingly, the government instead sought to express remorse by promoting a series of “national,” if not governmental, atonement projects carried out by AWF. More precisely, the government called for citizen contributions to the AWF that would be used for atonement to the former comfort women, while the government itself financed the Fund's medical and welfare projects in support of these women. The government also prepared a letter of apology given to the recipients of the atonement project and worked to gather historical documents and materials concerning the comfort women system so as to remember the lessons from history (AWF 1995). The AWF declared that all projects were completed when it built the last welfare facility in Indonesia, and was dissolved in 2007 (Murayama 2007).

The politicization of the comfort women system in the 1990s marked the critical moment for Japan to rebuild its diplomatic relations with Asian states. However, for postwar Japan, it was also a moment to reestablish its relationship with its wartime past and, thus, to redefine “who we were” and “who we are.” 50 years after the war, Japan was once again faced with the legacy of the past that it had hoped to have overcome, and was reminded that the wartime past was still haunting Japan in the postwar era. The comfort women issue was, in this sense, not only about improving relations with neighboring states, but it was also about rethinking and remaking the distinction between “postwar Japan” and “wartime Japan.” Also as an issue of identity, the comfort women issue started to occupy an important position in Japanese politics.

Defining Comfort Women: The Politics of Representation

The politicization of the question of the comfort women not only required former comfort women and feminist activists to speak up, but it also entailed the reconceptualization of the experiences of these women. By employing particular discursive strategies, international comfort women movements successfully transformed “a minor detail of the Second World War” into a “historical truth” to be uncovered by the testimonies of victims (Kimura 2008; Mendoza 2003). The use of a particular language, in other words, made it possible to construe the issue of the comfort women as a problem that could bear political relevance for today’s world and, thereby, could achieve sufficient international public attention.

In this sense, a key issue lies in the problematique concerning representations of the comfort women and of their experiences. How to define comfort women is always political. Indeed, depending on the definition, the responsibility of Japan could be conceived differently. While the term “comfort women” itself is “not so much a euphemism as a form of officialese” (Hicks 1995, 18), historically, the comfort women have also been labeled in many other ways. Chunghee Sarah Soh (2001; 2008) identifies multiple terms that have been employed to refer to the comfort women, ranging from “imperial gifts,” “pi” (genitals), and “sex slaves” to “chongsindae” (volunteer labor corps) and “prostitutes.” These labels give rise to competing meanings about comfort women, thereby producing their identity in vastly different ways. According to Soh, each term reflects the political ideology of those who use that specific term to name comfort women: the fascist paternalism of wartime Japan, the masculinist sexism of the Japanese imperial troops, the feminist humanitarianism of feminist activists, and the ethnic nationalism of ethnonationalist activists in South Korea and Japan.

The term “imperial gifts” was often used by wartime Japan, which devised a comfort women system not only to prevent soldiers from perpetrating sexual violence against women in occupied territories, but also to raise the morale of the imperial military.

“For imperial Japan, the comfort system was an institutionalized ‘gift,’ rewarding the emperor’s warriors—in a spirit of paternalistic omoiyari (consideration)—with a regulated liberation from their battlefield duties: the gift of brief moments of rest and recuperation in the comforting company of young and healthy ianfu” (Soh 2008, 38). Receiving such “gifts,” the soldiers felt grateful and obliged to repay the emperor by trying their hardest to win the war. The comfort women were, in this respect, a useful tool, not only to sustain military discipline, but also to preserve the unity between the emperor and his soldiers.⁴⁷ The comfort women were, thus, “commodities” that provided “comfort” to soldiers and served imperial purposes (Y. Tanaka 2002, 173). In fact, these women were regarded as essential “goods” for the military, which, according to the military records, transported comfort women on military ships nominally as “military materials” or “supplies” (Hicks 1995, 17; Soh 2001, 75; Ueno 2004, 85-6).

The dehumanization and commodification of the comfort women by wartime Japan were parallel to the soldiers’ depictions of comfort women as “pi.” “Pi” is a Chinese slang term referring to female genitals (Hicks 1995, 18; Soh 2001, 77-8; 2008, 39). The term was initially used by soldiers stationed in China and was later employed widely among Japanese troops. As Soh writes, “the use of slang phrases such as pi-kankan (pi viewing) and pi-mai (pi purchase) by Japanese soldiers stationed in China unequivocally reveals their perceptions of comfort women as prostitutes and hence the soldiers’ objectification and commodification of these women’s sexuality” (Soh 2008, 39). The comfort women were also called “kyodo benjyo” (public toilet) in the military, a word equally reflecting the soldiers' "dehumanization and objectification of women as sexual receptacles" and a Japanese "conventional attitude of male superiority" (Soh 2008, 40). Comfort women were, in this sense, essential goods to be supplied, purchased, and consumed to satisfy men's natural sexual needs. For these Japanese soldiers, the comfort stations were nothing more than facilities where they could exercise their "masculinist sexual rights" and enjoy access to the commercial service of recreational sex (Soh 2001, 78).

⁴⁷ Along these lines, Katharina R. Mendoza interestingly argues that, “seen though a Foucauldian lens, the comfort system can be understood as a disciplinary institution that, through the use of women’s bodies, disciplined the soldier with the intent of creating a body that was both intelligible and useful for furthering the Japanese imperial project” (Mendoza 2003, 251).

Such terms as "imperial gifts" and "pi" as used by wartime Japan and its troops did not problematize the system of comfort women. Nor did it invoke the responsibility of Japan. Feminist activists who seek to problematize the Japanese comfort women system, therefore, redefine comfort women as "sex slaves," a powerful terminology that construes the creation of comfort system as a violation of a jus cogens norm of international law. Any violation of jus cogens norms gives rise to universal jurisdiction, according to which any state may prosecute offences of these norms (McDougall 1998). This discourse is widespread today as it is seen in a series of UN reports and resolutions that describe the comfort system as "military sexual slavery" and identify Japan's past misconducts as constituting serious international crimes (Coomaraswamy 1996; McDougall 1998; Ueno 2004: 87-91). According to Soh, such a perception regarding comfort women is shaped by the emerging idea that "human rights include a woman's right to her bodily integrity," which effectively makes Japanese wartime military practices "human rights problems" (Copelon 1994; Soh 2001, 79-80; 2008, 41). Although both municipal and international laws often characterize rape as an attack against the "honor" of women (women, accordingly, become "dishonored" in the attack), feminists argue that “such characterizations are incorrect, as the only party without honour in any rape or in any situation of sexual violence is the perpetrator. While rape is indeed an assault on human dignity and bodily integrity, it is first and foremost a crime of violence” (McDougall 1998; see also Niarchos 2006, 292-97). From this perspective, the comfort women system is defined as an institution of systemic rape and sexual slavery “resulting in gross violations of women’s human rights and requiring state compensation to the survivors” (Soh 2008, 31-2). Some feminists further insist that the comfort women should also be identified as victims of “war crimes” and of “crimes against humanity,” thereby highlighting the seriousness of the issue and placing the legal, rather than moral, responsibility on Japan (Copelon 1994; Coomaraswamy 1996; McDougall 1998; Soh 2008: 41-2; Y. Tanaka 2002).

It is through this reconceptualization of the comfort women system that former comfort women have gained considerable sympathy around the world since the 1990s. The victim status of comfort women makes their voice more reliable and privileged as they are “construed as innocent” and “somehow free from sin” (Elshtain 1997, 251). Yet, more importantly, it is argued that such a redefinition has also made it possible for the former comfort women who had been viewed as mere “bodies” by imperial Japan to dauntlessly break their silence and fight against the wrongdoers who have caused their suffering. Many comfort women went through the great embarrassment of having such experiences and often blamed themselves for becoming “unworthy” and “stained” (Kimura 2008; Mendoza 2003; Ueno 2004). The new narrative about the comfort system, however, suggests that sexual exploitation “became no longer an experience that the ‘Comfort Women’ should feel ashamed of or for which they should blame themselves,” and that Japan ought to be responsible for all their hardship (Kimura 2008, 13). By redefining themselves as “victims,” the former comfort women believe that “the victims/survivors should face up to their past bravely in order to regain their dignity” rather than remain ashamed of their painful experiences and suffer from low-esteem as tainted bodies (Kimura 2008, 14).

Today, “sex slaves” is an internationally accepted term to describe comfort women, but some other names are also used locally in the victimized countries. In South Korea, the comfort women are more commonly called “chongsindae” (teishintai in Japanese) or Volunteer Labor Corps. This Korean term actually refers to the corps formed by unmarried women in Japan and Korea to support the war economy during the last couple of years of the Pacific War. Although these women were mobilized to provide labor for manufacturing, construction, and food production, some of them are said to have been taken as comfort women. As a result, in South Korea, the term “chongsindae” is widely abused when referring to comfort women since most Korean comfort women were actually not deceptively drafted into becoming comfort women under the guise of “chongsindae,” and most Volunteer Labor Corps members never engaged in sexual labor (Soh 2008). Rather, as Soh (2008, 62) writes, “the Korean usage of the term chongsindae to refer to comfort women proved to be a sociopsychologically as well as a politically effective decision on the part of activists in order to highlight the deceptive and/or coercive methods used in the recruitment of Korean comfort women.” Further, it “help[ed] avoid the negative image of prostitutes evoked by the term wianbu” (comfort women) (Soh 2008, 62). In this sense, “chongsindae” has become a nationalist euphemism in South Korea that accentuates the innocence and purity of the comfort women, thereby provoking a nationalistic reaction and mobilizing wider public support for the comfort women movement.

In the Philippines, former comfort women are generally referred to as “lolas” or grandmothers. To carry the Filipino comfort women movement forward, activists faced the need to “reinvest those [dehumanized and commodified] bodies [of the comfort women] with value and agency” so that their voices could be heard in society (Mendoza 2003, 257). The activists confronted this challenge by depicting the survivors as “paragons of virtuous Filipino womanhood and as gentle old grandmothers” (Mendoza 2003, 258). This way, they successfully constructed “the true ‘crime’ of the comfort system as the threat it posed to the ideal family unit,” something that Filipino men and the state must bravely combat (Mendoza 2003, 259). The discourse of motherhood also helped to give the former comfort women a positive self-image through which they could overcome their sense of “dirtiness” or “impurity” and openly come forward as former comfort women. Indeed, the symbolism of the grandmother “conveniently erases the actual feminine sexuality of former comfort women, whose suffering was rooted in the very exploitation and violation of their youthful sexual bodies” (Soh 2008, 75).

It is interesting to note that the term “grandmother” is also used for the survivors in South Korea (“halmoni”) and Taiwan (“ama”). There, the term is used to avoid the image of prostitution and to show respect for the survivors (Soh 2008, 72-4). The wide usage of the term “grandmother” is indicative of a nationalistic and patriarchal ideology underlying local comfort women movements. That is, women are “the community’s—or the nation’s—most valuable possessions,” “the principal vehicle for transmuted the whole nation’s values from one generation to the next,” and “nationalist wombs,” which must be protected at all costs (Enloe 1990). Any attack on them should be regarded as an attack on the nation or the entire national community, thus creating the comfort women issue as a “national” matter rather than as a women’s human rights concern (Soh 2000).

Lastly, in the face of these international feminist movements, the conservatives in Japan put up a strong resistance by continuing to define comfort women as “military prostitutes” or “licensed prostitutes.” This conception not only denies the legal responsibility of Japan, but also questions the “victimhood” of the comfort women by challenging the discourses of forced prostitution and systemic rape committed against these women. These conservative ethnonationalists argue that military prostitutes were rewarded for their services, and that these were merely commercial transactions between the prostitutes and the Japanese soldiers. In fact, “in the comfort women system, soldiers usually purchased a ticket to receive service from a comfort woman. Entering the woman’s room, they personally handed the ticket to her” (Y. Tanaka 2002, 173). It is also well known that among these comfort women were professional prostitutes recruited in both Japan and abroad (Hicks 1995; Soh 2001). If the comfort women were “whores” or “fallen women” who were already “dirty” and “unchaste,” and who voluntarily offered their bodies to men and sold sex, they could never be “raped” nor claim “victimhood.” This discourse, thus, conceals a coercive element in the comfort women system while ironically recognizing the agency of the former comfort women (Ueno 2004, 82-6). As a result, there continues to be a fierce controversy throughout Japan and the world as to whether comfort women were “sex slaves” or “public prostitutes,” a debate that weighs heavily on the question of Japan’s responsibility toward the survivors (Soh 2001; 2008).

As Soh rightly notes, these vastly different representations of the comfort women suggest that “there is more than one side to the identity of the ‘comfort women’” (Soh 2001, 71). In fact, the experiences of comfort women were as diverse as their ethnic backgrounds, the methods of their recruitment, and the location of comfort stations (Hicks 1995; Oh 2001; Soh 2008). Thus, competing discourses that seek to define comfort women are various parts of a representational politics endowing comfort women with a particular identity. All these representations are “only partial truths, deriving from the political interests and the ethical stances of the opposing camps” (Soh 2001, 71).

From this perspective, it can be argued that the reconceptualization of the comfort women as victims of state violence has made it possible to invoke the responsibility of Japan toward the survivors while also constructing the comfort women issue as an international problem. Japan’s policy on this issue can thus be understood as a normal reaction to the construction of comfort women as those who deserve Japan’s formal apology and atonement. More importantly, Soh’s argument suggests the normative power of language, which produces meanings and naturalizes a certain practice as an adequate response. As a result of taking certain discursive strategies, Japan’s official apology and compensation for the survivors could be normalized.

While affording great insight into this study, this argument seems to imply that Japan as an unproblematic subject/self acquires a “former aggressor” identity in relation to these “victims” and formulates foreign policy based on such an understanding of the self and the other. Japan’s foreign policy is, in other words, a consequence of both Japan and the comfort women gaining certain identities, whereby identities serve as the basis for foreign policy. However, I would argue that Japan’s identity is a performative construction that is produced through foreign policy. As we saw in Chapter II, from a poststructuralist perspective, there is no identity prior to foreign policy. Rather, the haunting legacies of war transformed into foreign policy issues (including the comfort women issue) create a condition of possibility for Japan, whose identity is constituted and maintained by making discursive boundaries not only between “neighboring Asia” and “Japan,” but also between “wartime Japan” and “postwar Japan.” In this sense, Japan needs these wartime legacies so that its postwar identity can be secured. “Postwar Japan” is a construction, an effect of discourse, not an entity existing prior to foreign policy.

In the following sections, I analyze Japanese official discourses on the comfort women issue. Through this analysis, I seek to show how the identity of postwar Japan is performatively created through the issue of the comfort women.

Official Discourse: The Discursive Construction of “Postwar Japan”

The official narratives about the comfort women issue in the early 1990s represented a radical revision to Japan’s overall approach to the problem. It was the first time that Japan had directly engaged the issue and thereby broken away from an unofficial policy of not remembering the comfort women. The problematization of the comfort women system was made possible by a series of statements delivered about the matter by the government. Although the Japanese government had previously denied the involvement of the wartime government in establishing and managing comfort stations, these statements construed the Japanese wartime institution of comfort women as a serious “mistake,” and expressed Japan’s formal apology and remorse toward former comfort women. The recognition of the problem invoked the responsibility of Japan to take appropriate action toward these women. The official statements, in this sense, articulate Japanese political self now facing the problem of the comfort women head on, while also constructing the comfort women as an object of policy discussion.

Underlying the problematization of the comfort women system is the recognition of comfort women as victims of state violence. Among others, the Kono statement (1993) clearly admits that many women were drafted as comfort women “against their own will,” through “coercion” and “coaxing,” and “lived in misery at comfort stations under a coercive atmosphere.” As both Prime Minister Murayama (1994, 1995) and Chief Cabinet Secretary Kono (1993) said and clarified, the problem lies in the reality that the comfort women system as an officially-organized system of sexual exploitation “seriously stained the honor and dignity of many women” and brought them “immeasurable pain and incurable physical and psychological wounds.” The portrayal of the comfort women as pitiful victims is central to the discourse on the comfort women issue that seeks to invoke Japan’s moral responsibility to deal with this matter.

The official statements also place the issue in the larger picture of the Pacific War, whereby the problem of the comfort women is understood as one of the wartime and colonial legacies in Asia. Murayama (1995) states: “During these past 50 years we have worked hard to cultivate, step by step, friendly relations with our neighboring Asian countries and others. However, the scars of war still run deep in these countries to this day. The problem of the so-called wartime comfort women is one such scar.” Identified as a legacy of war, the problem is represented as a matter between Japan and neighboring Asian nations, or between a former aggressor state and its victims. This means that the issue is understood in the manner of “we victimized their women,” that is to say, as an issue of Japanese victimization of Asia and Asia's women. The question of the comfort women is, in this sense, spatially constructed as an "Asian" problem rather than as a general issue arising between the Japanese government and women from various parts of the region. Prime Minister Murayama (1994), accordingly, states that "one way of demonstrating such feelings of apologies and remorse is to work to further promote mutual understanding with the countries and areas concerned." In other words, the comfort women issue is to be solved by improving Japan's relationships with victimized Asian states through foreign policy.

Note that missing from this picture is the existence of those Japanese women who also served the Japanese military as comfort women. Identified with Asia, the "former comfort women" only refer to women of the formerly subjugated nations and thus constitute an identity distinct from Japan. Thus, the Asian Women's Fund was established to conduct national atonement projects for the former comfort women in the victimized states, leaving out former comfort women inside Japan. As the appeal for donations for the Fund declares, "of paramount importance [...] is the need for as many Japanese citizens as possible to appreciate the suffering of the victims and to express a genuine desire for atonement" (AWF 1995). The appeal goes on to say: "we are convinced that, if each and every citizen of Japan would do his or her best to understand the plight of the victims, and then act in a concrete manner to make amends, and if such a commitment—coming, as it must, from the heart—could reach the women involved, then our actions would help mitigate, to some extent, the trauma they have lived through and continue to live with" (AWF 1995).

This discourse makes the comfort women of Japanese origin merely a constitutive part of the now apologizing Japanese self/state. Defined as “Asian” or “foreign” women, the comfort women constitute Japan’s external other, thus making possible the dichotomy between “Japan” and “Asia” or Japan’s “inside” and its “outside.” In this picture, the institution of the comfort women system symbolizes Japan’s victimization of Asian others, while the comfort women themselves become symbolic of the victimhood of Asia as a whole. In this sense, what is at stake with the problem of the comfort women is not Japan as a sex criminal, but Japan as an aggressor and a victimizer in its international relations with Asia.

The comfort women issue, therefore, invokes the question of what Japan was for Asia. The comfort women are a reminder of Japan’s wartime aggressiveness, or of its past militarist self. Accordingly, as the successor to wartime Japan, Japan today is held responsible for what it did in the past against these Asian women. The discourse of succession or continuation is implicated not only in Japan’s official apology and remorse for its past actions, but also in its declared determination to “face historical facts” and/or “never repeat the same mistake,” the phrases repeated by Chief Cabinet Secretaries Kato (1992) and Kono (1993) and successive Prime Ministers, including Murayama (1994, 1995) and Hashimoto (1996). In the appeal for donations to the AWF, the continuum is more clearly indicated. It reads: “It is the Japanese state of the past that created the ‘comfort women.’ [...] To make amends for the past, then, fifty years after the fact, is our responsibility—we, the present generation, owe it to the victims, to the international community, and to future generations” (AWF 1995).⁴⁸

However, the repeated claims made in governmental statements that those pitiful comfort women were victimized by “the then authorities” produce “wartime Japan” as a distinct identity in contrast to “contemporary Japan.” The 1993 Kono statement, as well as the second official survey report on the issue of comfort women that was released with the Kono statement (Naikaku kanbo gaisei shingi shitsu 1993), explicitly note that “comfort stations were operated in response to the request of the military authorities of the day,” and that “the then Japanese military was, directly or indirectly, involved in the establishment and management of the comfort stations and the transfer of comfort women” (emphasis added). The responsibility of wartime Japan is further emphasized in the statement by Prime Minister Murayama (1994), in which he characterized wartime militarist Japan by such words as “colonial rule,” “acts of aggression,” and “caused such unbearable suffering and sorrow for so many people.” These descriptions are in striking contrast to depictions of contemporary Japan in official statements, which indicate that Japan today “express[es] its sincere apology and remorse” to former comfort women (Kato 1992), “reiterate[s] our firm determination never to repeat the same mistake” (Kono 1993), and further hopes to “take an active part in dealing with violence and other forms of injustice to the honor and dignity of women” (Hashimoto 1996). Indeed, as Chief Cabinet Secretary Kato explicitly stated in his statement, postwar Japan is determined to become a “pacifist nation” and “will endeavor to build up new future-oriented relations with the Republic of Korea and with other countries and regions in Asia.”

⁴⁸ In the official translation, “the Japanese state of the past” is translated as “the Japanese nation of the past.” However, in the original Japanese statement, the term “kokka” is used. As this term means “state” rather than “people,” to avoid the confusion, I replaced the word “nation” in the original translation with “state.”

In short, if wartime Japan is identified as colonialist and aggressive, postwar Japan is conversely constructed as having an identity that is pacifist, cooperative, and sympathetic to the comfort women. Official discourse continues to articulate postwar Japan as possessing the capacity to learn from the past and, thus, as a temporally progressing self in relation to wartime Japan, which these statements present as the temporal other to be negated and overcome by this new postwar entity and identity.

Accordingly, it becomes imperative for postwar Japan, given its depiction as a “reborn” entity distinguishable from wartime Japan, to accept its moral responsibility toward the former comfort women who have been suffering unbearable wounds since the war. The portrayal of pacifist Japan and pitiful victims invokes the responsibility of Japan to help and support the former comfort women (but only Asian ones). Indeed, the very acts of atonement and support can reproduce the identity of postwar Japan as a responsible state and as a subject benign enough to heal their wounds and salve their suffering. “A new Japan,” in other words, is a performative construction.

However, the distancing of wartime Japan from postwar Japan means that Japan produces its otherness by the externalization of evil elements found within the self. “Who we were” and “who we are not anymore” define “who we now are,” and “wartime Japan” becomes integral to the construction of “postwar Japan.” In this respect, no matter how much Japan’s foreign policy discourses are trying to make this past self into a distant other, postwar Japan will never be able to fully overcome wartime Japan. Postwar Japan continues to take on meaning as an antithesis to wartime Japan. And to produce its renewed identity, postwar Japan needs this wartime self as its shadow, a shadow or haunting presence that embodies characteristics contemporary Japan allegedly does not have.

In this respect, postwar Japan is, and must be, always haunted by its past self. It is in fact this otherness that secures the identity and meaning of postwar Japan. Ultimately, postwar Japan is always in the shadow of its past and always threatened by another self that nonetheless makes possible the peace-loving identity of postwar Japan. Postwar Japan's identity, in this sense, will never be settled, nor will it "achiev[e] the completion or wholeness toward which it strives" (Edkins and Pin-Fat 1999, 1). It must continuously reproduce itself by performance. As a critical site of Japanese identity politics, the comfort women issue offers a condition of possibility for "postwar Japan." By talking about the past, defining "what it was," apologizing to the victims, and expressing its determination to maintain its stance as a pacifist state, the reality of a reborn Japan is constituted, albeit in the shadow of a haunting ghost of wartime Japan

Media Discourses: Posing Challenges to the Moral State

If a series of government statements discursively construct the comfort women issue as an issue of wartime sexual exploitation of Asian women by militarist Japan, newspaper editorials instead construct this issue as a "contemporary" problem that questions the very possibility of a distinction between wartime Japan and postwar Japan. Since the early 1990s, even before the government acknowledged the officially administered comfort women system, newspaper editorials have repeatedly taken up the issue and urged the government to adopt a determined attitude to solve the problem.

While the initial discussion of the issue problematized the fact that the Japanese government had neglected former comfort women for almost 50 years, thereby destabilizing the morality of postwar Japan, the media debate gradually shifted its focus to the question of why Japan is still not fully accepted as a responsible/respectable member of the international community. These editorials, although written from different perspectives, represent Japan as being haunted by its wartime legacy and thus struggling with the contradictory image of seeing itself as a reborn moral state and the regional/international perceptions of Japan as an insincere and irresponsible aggressor. Here too, similar to the Okinawa rape case/situation discussed in Chapter IV, the media discourses give rise to powerful counter-narratives that not only redefine the “comfort women problem,” but also go to the heart of Japan’s unsettled identity.

Many editorials written between 1992 and 1993, when the government issued the Kato and the Kono Statements, generally construed the comfort women issue as a problem that destabilized the boundaries between wartime Japan and postwar Japan. While official discourse problematized wartime violence and thereby made the comfort women issue a “past issue” having to do with militarist Japan, these newspaper editorials, by contrast, emphasized the fact that Japan had long ignored the former comfort women and thus called into question the morality of postwar Japan, that is to say, the very quality that should distinguish postwar Japan from wartime Japan. Indeed, up until 1992, Japan had never adequately addressed the issue nor showed any sincerity toward the victims even though Japan’s past crime was such that Asia’s “grudge against Japan [would] never disappear in a generation or two.”⁴⁹ What these editorials questioned was, therefore, not what wartime Japan had done to the women, but rather how it was that postwar Japan had left this problem unaddressed for so long. The Nihon Keizai Shinbun asked: “Why didn’t former Japanese leaders deliver the message [of apology and remorse to former comfort women] earlier? Although they gave the excuse that facts had been unclear, the truth is probably that the Japanese government lacked the proper attitude to readily clarify the facts.”⁵⁰ The Mainichi Shinbun similarly maintained that, although some people might wonder why Japan has to face demands for reparation some 50 years or so after the war, “what is indeed ridiculous is that this issue has been sealed off for half a century.”⁵¹ “The fundamental problem,” the Asahi Shinbun explained, “is our national tendency to avoid dealing with dishonorable history.”⁵² From this viewpoint, the comfort women issue was presented as an ongoing and contemporary issue, a current situation and problem. Japan had failed to make it a “problem of the past only.”

Thus, these editorials fundamentally questioned the transformation of “old Japan” into a “new Japan.” If wartime Japan had humiliated these women by forcing them to serve as part of the comfort women system, postwar Japan left them to suffer and to cry themselves to sleep in silence. That is, postwar Japan, although claiming to be a moral subject and a responsible member of the international community, continued to hurt and ⁴⁹ “Nikkan ‘fudangi no kaidan’ wo kasaneyou” [Let’s Have Numerous Casual Meetings between Japan and South Korea], Mainichi Shinbun, 6 November, 1993.

⁵⁰ “Nikkan kankei ni shinjigen no hatten wo kitaisuru” [Expecting the Development of a New Dimension of Japan-South Korean Relations], Nihon Keizai Shinbun, 18 January, 1992.

⁵¹ “Sengo hosho: 48 nenme no aratana senso ninshiki” [Postwar Reparations: A New Perception Toward War in the 48th year], Mainichi Shinbun, 17 August, 1993.

⁵² “Nikkan no mirai hiraku dodai zukuri wo” [Establish the Foundations for Opening a Bright Future for Japan and South Korea], Asahi Shinbun, 18 January, 1992.

humiliate the former comfort women by refusing to accept their sexual exploitation as an ongoing “problem.” As a result, Japan continued to face Asian mistrust and hatred, and overall the suspicion that postwar Japan was qualitatively different from wartime Japan. The emergence of the comfort women question in the 1990s—almost 50 years after the war—suggested that Japan remained tied to, and haunted by, the wartime legacy. Japan, in this sense, still “dwel[t] on its past.”⁵³ As the Asahi Shinbun stated, there was still a huge gap between the ideal self (a responsible, moral state and a moral leader in Asia) and the real self (a mistrusted state still blamed for what it did a half century ago).⁵⁴

It is in this context that the comfort women issue was considered as a critical question where “Japan’s morality [was] put to the test.”⁵⁵ That is to say, at stake was postwar Japan’s identity, or the question of whether Japan could finally differentiate itself from its past self or not. In fact, many editorials found a possibility for Japan to overcome its wartime history. Indeed, the comfort women issue, by evoking a responsibility toward the neglected women, now offered a chance for Japan to become a trusted state and to break away from its shameful past. For example, the Mainichi Shinbun argued that the “adverse legacy” of Japan’s “dark past” could now be transformed into a “positive asset” by educating young people to become “global citizens” and thus to help build a relationship of mutual trust among Asian nations.⁵⁶ The Yomiuri Shinbun also noted that Japan could turn the lessons of the past to its advantage by actively fulfilling international responsibilities, such as taking part in UN peacekeeping operations (more on this matter in Chapter VI).⁵⁷ Yet, immediate challenges for Japan would be to face historical truths, to sincerely express regret, to deeply reflect on its past behavior, to learn from history, and to help the stories of the past circulate from generation to generation. In this sense, these editorials also welcomed Japan's move toward a recognition of its responsibility for the former comfort women system and toward a final resolution of the issue. Indeed, it was the first step Japan had ever made to "show both domestically and internationally that Japan can admit its past faults as faults."⁵⁸ Accordingly, through these efforts, Japan would finally be able to establish a "dividing line" between its irresponsible, immoral self of the past and its new responsible and moral self in the making.

⁵³ “Sengo hoshō: 48 nenme no aratana senso ninshiki” [Postwar Reparations: A New Perception Toward War in the 48th year], Mainichi Shinbun, 17 August, 1993.

⁵⁴ “Asia no fushin wo tachikiro” [Dispel Asia’s Mistrust], Asahi Shinbun, 19 August, 1993; “Nihon no dogi ga tamesareteiru” [Japan’s Morality Is Being Tested], Asahi Shinbun, 20 March, 1993.

⁵⁵ “Nihon no dogi ga tamesareteiru” [Japan’s Morality Is Being Tested], Asahi Shinbun, 20 March, 1993.

While the editorials written in the early 1990s raised the possibility that Japan would become a moral state through dealing with the comfort women issue, the persisting criticism of Japan for trying to evade its responsibility as a former aggressor in Asia pointed to an unchanging regional and international perception of Japan as immoral and reluctant to face history. Indeed, although the AWF was severely criticized for allowing the government to not officially compensate the former comfort women, the Japanese government never took further action to solve the problem of the comfort women

⁵⁶ "Shusen kinenbi: 'shinryaku senso no hansei' no jissuitsuka wo: Soreha hoshō to kyoiku no tettei" [The Anniversary of the End of WWII: Materialize a "Regret over the Aggressive War"], Mainichi Shinbun, 15 August, 1993.

⁵⁷ "'Kyōseisei' mitometa 'ianfu' chosa" [The "Coerciveness" Recognized in the Investigation on "Comfort Women"], Yomiuri Shinbun, 5 August, 1993.

⁵⁸ "Kyonju no seika wo atarashii soseki ni" [Make the Achievement in Gyeongju a New Cornerstone], Asahi Shinbun, 9 November, 1993.

(Nishino 2008). Many women refused to accept compensation from the AWF and, in 2000, the Japanese government ignored international feminist efforts to hold the Women's International War Crimes Tribunal on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery, a people's tribunal designed to bring Japan to justice on the basis of international law. This tribunal was largely ignored by the Japanese media, too. While the Japanese government simply repeated the already issued statements, the media started to show less interest in problematizing the wartime comfort women system, as if the problem had been completely solved.

2007 was a landmark year for the situation of the comfort women. In the spring, the Women's Fund completed all its planned projects and finally disbanded. While Japan believed that it had made sincere efforts to solve the problem, in July, the United States' House of Representatives passed Resolution 121 that severely criticized Japan for not acting appropriately about the issue of the comfort women (Arai 2008). Although similar resolutions had been submitted to the House of Representatives several times prior to this, the 2007 resolution was the first one to be actually adopted. This US action was followed by those of other states, including the Netherlands, Canada, and the European Parliament, which also adopted resolutions against Japan on the comfort women issue by the end of 2007.

Increasing international criticism of Japan was a great shock to Japanese society. Most importantly, it meant that not only Asian states but also the West did not regard Japan as a responsible or fully moral member of the international community. As the media debate concentrated on the persisting international distrust of Japan, what was at stake in the comfort women issue was no longer either the "past" or the morality of postwar Japan. Rather, the comfort women issue was interpreted as a manifestation of how the world saw Japan. It was an issue of international acceptance of Japan in the contemporary era.

“Why are we still fettered by the wartime legacy?”, editorials asked. These editorials tried to analyze the causes of the unchanging international perception of Japan as an aggressor while revealing a constant fear of international mistrust. Many editorials found the immediate cause in the irresponsible remarks made by then Prime Minister Abe Shinzo and by some other conservative politicians who occasionally cast doubt on the forced recruitment of the comfort women by the Japanese military. They argued that it must have been not the military, but private entrepreneurs that had abducted women and forced them to serve as comfort women. According to newspaper editorials in 2007, such assertions invited fierce international criticisms and overall suspicion toward Japan, thus undermining Japan’s continued efforts to convey its apologies to the survivors, to improve relations with China and South Korea, and to enhance its international credibility. They also argued that Prime Minister Abe’s remarks might have created the image that Japan did not dare to face its history and that Japan instead tried to distort history and escape responsibility, something that the international community would see as “unsightly” and “shameful.” That is to say, because of Japan’s inconsistent attitude toward the comfort women issue, Japan remained unable to dispel international mistrust and thus hurt its own honor and confidence.

Many of the editorials also expressed concern that Japan appeared to speak with a “double tongue.”⁵⁹ That is, Prime Minister Abe questioned the coerced prostitution while his administration formally inherited the official stance expressed in the Kono Statement. These editorials, accordingly, blamed Prime Minister Abe for his thoughtless words and urged the government to explicitly describe Japan’s official stance so that Japan could gain international acceptance. After all, Japan had to admit that, whether as a result of the Japanese military or of private entrepreneurs, “upon request from the military, an inhumane system of military comfort women was established,” and that “many women were compelled to go through a humiliating and tragic experience.”⁶⁰

Other editorials, however, expressed frustration at the fact that Japan was not understood by the international community and blamed the United States for its attitude toward Japan. Some editorials asserted that the US resolution was unacceptable because it ignored all of Japan’s efforts to solve the problem, including the repeated official apologies and the projects launched by the Asian Women’s Fund.⁶¹ Some also believed that the resolution exhibited an American misunderstanding about “historical facts.” That is, the forced prostitution by the Japanese military was not objectively supported by evidence. Indeed, it was pointed out that some academic debates had concluded in the mid-1990s (after the official apology was made to the former comfort women) that the Japanese military did not force women to serve as comfort women (comfort women were rather recruited by private entrepreneurs, in some cases forcibly).⁶² In this respect, the Kono Statement, creating the impression that forced prostitution had indeed happened, did not adequately reflect the historical facts and should be reviewed by the government to remove any international misperception of the situation.⁶³ A more disturbing issue, these editorials observed, was that other states also used to have their own comfort

⁵⁹ “Ianfu ketsugi: Beikoku no shusho he no keisho da” [The Comfort Women Resolution: This Is America’s Warning to the Prime Minister], Minami Nihon Shinbun, 2 August, 2007; “Ianfu mondai: Hansei koso sonkei wo eru michi da” [The Comfort Women Problem: Expressing Regret Is the Way to Earn Respect], Kanagawa Shinbun, 4 April, 2007; “Ianfu’ ketsugi: I wo tsukushi setsumei shitaka” [The “Comfort Women” Resolution: Did Japan Explain Sincerely?], Kyoto Shinbun, 28 June 2007; “Abe shusho hobei: Shakumei de hajimaru to ha irei” [Prime Minister Abe’s Visit to the US: The Unprecedented Start with Excuses], Kyoto Shinbun, 28 April 2007.

⁶⁰ “Abe gaiko ga tamesareteiru” [Abe’s Diplomacy is Being Tested], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 5 August, 2007; “Reisei na taio ga motomerareru” [A Calm Response is Needed], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 28 June, 2007; “Jugun ianfu mondai: Taio ha Kono danwa wo kihon ni” [The Comfort Women Problem: The Kono Statement Should be the Basis of Japan’s Response], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 11 March, 2007.

⁶¹ “Ianfu ketsugi: Beikoku no shusho he no keisho da” [The Comfort Women Resolution: This Is American Warning to the Prime Minister], Minami Nihon Shinbun, 2 August, 2007; “Jugun ianfu: Fushinkan fusshoku suru doryoku wo” [Comfort Women: Make Efforts to Dispel Their Mistrust], Minami Nihon Shinbun, 18 March, 2007; “Nichibei kankei sokoneru ianfu ketsugi” [The Comfort Women Resolution Harming Japan-US Relations], Nihon Keizai Shinbun, 1 August, 2007; “Abe hobei de nichibei domei wo seijoka dekiruka” [Can Japan Normalize Japan-US Alliance by Abe’s Visit to the US?], Nihon Keizai Shinbun, 16 April, 2007; “Ianfu ketsugi: ‘Nichibei no mizo’ umeru doryoku wo” [The Comfort Women

Resolution: Make Efforts to Bridge the Gap between Japan and the US], Kumamoto Nichinichi Shinbun, 2 August, 2007; “Abe gaiko ga tamesareteiru” [Abe’s Diplomacy is Being Tested], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 5 August, 2007; “Reisei na taio ga motomerareru” [A Cal Response is Needed], Nishi Nihon Shinbun, 28 June, 2007; “Ianfu mondai: Shusho ha setsumei wo kichinto” [The Comfort Women Problem: The Prime Minister Should Give a Full Explanation], Shinano Mainichi Shinbun, 26 March, 2007; “Jugun ianfu: Gokai wo hirogeta shusho toben” [Comfort Women: The Prime Minister’s Statement That Bred Misunderstanding], Kyoto Shinbun, 8 March, 2007; “Ianfu ketsugi: Shusho ha shinkokusa wo ninshiki seyo” [The Comfort Women Resolution: The Prime Minister Must Recognize the Seriousness], Asahi Shinbun, 28 June, 2007.

⁶² “Ianfu ketsugi: Oshu deno rensa hanno ga shinpaيدا” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Concern about the Domino Effect in Europe], Yomiuri Shinbun, 15 December, 2007; “Ianfu ketsugi: Beigikai no ‘gokai’ no nemoto wo tate” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Root out the American Parliament’s Misunderstanding], Yomiuri Shinbun, 28 June, 2007; “Ianfu mondai: Kakushin wo sorashite giron suruna” [The Comfort Women Problem: Don’t Discuss the Issue Without Getting to the Heart of the Problem], Yomiuri Shinbun, 7 March, 2007; “‘Ianfu’ ketsugian: Nihon seifu ha kichinto hanron seyo” [The “Comfort Women” Resolution: The Japanese Government Should Object to It Decidedly], Yomiuri Shinbun, 16 October, 2006.

⁶³ Some editorials argued that the Kono Statement was rather the product of a political compromise between Japan and South Korea. More precisely, Japan issued the statement since South Korea had told Japan that it would not ask for individual compensation if Japan conceded forced prostitution. “Ianfu ketsugi: Kajo hanno shinai kotoda” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Don’t Overreact], Hokkoku Shinbun, 16 March, 2007; “Ianfu mondai: Gaiko ni fusawashiku nai” [The Comfort Women Problem: It Is Not Adequate to Treat It as a Foreign Policy Issue], Hokkoku Shinbun, 1 August, 2007. Also see “Ianfu ketsugi: Oshu deno rensa hanno ga shinpaيدا” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Concern about the Domino Effect in Europe], Yomiuri Shinbun, 15 December, 2007; “Ianfu ketsugi: Beigikai no ‘gokai’ no nemoto wo tate” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Root out the American Parliament’s Misunderstanding], Yomiuri Shinbun, 28 June, 2007.

women system. In particular, the US occupational forces “reused” the Japanese comfort women system for their own sexual needs. However, instead of facing its own dishonor, the United States decided to criticize Japan and to hurt Japan’s international moral credibility.⁶⁴

Although these editorials interpreted international criticism in different ways, they all depicted Japan as struggling to dispel international mistrust and to be fully accepted as a respected member of the international community. Despite repeated formal apologies to former comfort women and the atonement made through the Women’s Fund, Japan was not regarded as fulfilling its responsibility of facing its history. Because of Prime Minister Abe’s remarks, an international misunderstanding of historical facts, or American biased views of Japan, postwar Japan remained haunted by its former victims and by misinformed or frustrated international others. These editorials thus constructed Japan as an “international pariah” since Japan continued to be hated, misunderstood, and mistrusted in Asia and throughout the world. In this sense, the boundaries between wartime Japan and postwar Japan that the official discourse tried to articulate became unsettled and disrupted in the media. There was no such a thing as a “postwar Japan” that had totally overcome its haunting others.

⁶⁴ “Ianfu ketsugi: Ayamatta rekishi no hitori aruki ga shinpaيدا” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Anxiety about the Misinformed History Becoming out of Control], Yomiuri Shinbun, 1 August, 2007. Also see “Ianfu ketsugi: Kajo hanno shinai kotoda” [The Comfort Women Resolution: Don’t Overreact], Hokkoku Shinbun, 16 March, 2007; “Ianfu mondai: Gaiko ni fusawashiku nai” [The Comfort Women Problem: It Is Not Adequate to Treat It as a Foreign Policy Issue], Hokkoku Shinbun, 1 August, 2007.

Conclusion

This chapter has attempted to demonstrate that the comfort women issue constitutes a crucial site where Japan performatively constructs its postwar identity. The comfort women issue represents a disgraceful history that Japan wants to forget and overcome. Although the issue of the comfort women is one of many postwar reparation problems that have arisen between Japan and the former victim states, among these wartime legacies, the issue is given significant weight and continues to be hotly debated in Japan and across Asia.

For the former victim states, the question is not only about Japan's war responsibility, but also about their own national pride that was damaged through the bodies of the comfort women. For them, the rape of Asian comfort women is the rape of Asia itself, which eventually emasculates the identities of these Asian states (Kim 1997). In South Korea, Taiwan, and Indonesia, former comfort women are now represented not only by activist groups but also by their national states that fight against Japan on their behalf (Soh 2000). The former comfort women's bodies are, accordingly, "nationalized," while the issue is represented as a matter of national importance.

On the other hand, for Japan, these unfortunate female victims are a powerful reminder of wartime Japan's evil, aggressiveness, and hyper-masculinity. Their presence calls into question Japan's proud and noble identity, all the more so since most of these victims were "weak," "naïve" young women in occupied territories. The comfort women issue, therefore, occupies an important place in any discussion of Japan's wartime responsibilities, and continues to generate tremendous controversy in Japan.

Yet, this chapter has suggested that, in official discourses, the comfort women are not merely symbolic of Asian victimhood vis-à-vis Japan, but also present a condition of possibility for postwar Japan, making Japan's pacifist identity possible. The question of the comfort women allows Japan not only to reinscribe its spatial/political boundaries with Asia, but also to reestablish temporal boundaries between a moral and pacifist postwar Japan and a militant wartime Japan. The comfort women were once a symbol of Japanese domination over Asia, and thus of "macho" Japan. Today, the apology to these women performatively continues to produce a masculine identity, but a seemingly more benign one as a state/self that claims to have bravely faced its past and wants to take the lead in addressing women's issues as well as realizing world peace.

In this sense, Japan's policy toward the former comfort women is not simply a way to express formal apologies for past misconduct, but also an attempt to performatively reconstruct Japan's postwar identity. This actually means that, at the moment the comfort women achieved official apologies from the Japanese government, the comfort women problem was relegated to the politics of speaking of/for the comfort women, where these women not only became an object of policy discussion, but also became instrumental in the construction of a moral Japan. While national atonement projects were carried out for the sake of former comfort women, the comfort women themselves would lose control of the definition of the "issue" before Japanese identity politics.

Still, as the analysis of newspaper editorials has also suggested, this matter is still very much contested. Despite official discourses, competing images of postwar Japan still abound. Postwar Japan is haunted not only by its own past, but also by the US and international others that constantly confront Japan with its past ghosts and challenge its allegedly reborn honorable and moral identity. Thus, the comfort women issue remains a performative and discursive space that is critical for the ongoing reconstruction of the Japanese self. An endless controversy over the comfort women keeps producing a source for Japan's national imagination of its self and identity.

VI. CONCLUSION: UN PEACEKEEPING OPERATIONS AND THE ENACTMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL JAPAN

This dissertation has shown the performative construction of postwar Japan through foreign policy discourses. Instead of proving a causal or constitutive relationship between identity and foreign policy, this study has examined their “co-constitutive” relationship by conceptualizing foreign policy as a set of practices that construct, reproduce, and maintain the state identity in whose name it operates. As a discursive construction, identity is always unstable and unsettled. It cannot be possessed by any actor like a “thing,” nor is there an end to identity formation. Rather, identity is itself a “fabrication” or a “fantasy.” Subjects are “only produced as the truth effects of a discourse of primary and stable identity” and sustained through the repeated practices of signification that reenact the subjects (Butler 1990, 174).

In this sense, the state is a political subject whose subjectivity is performatively constructed by discourse. The state continuously reproduces its identity or self through a series of signifying practices that establish a boundary for the state through a distinction between internal/domestic and external/foreign. That is, it is by the very signification of the state’s identity and the instituting of the other that the state comes into being as a subject. As Weber notes, “the identity of the state is performatively constituted by the very expressions that are said to be its result” (1998, 90).

Based on this understanding of identity, this dissertation examined foreign policy as a crucial site where state identity is performatively constructed. Foreign policy documents, statements, as well as media discussions of foreign policy issues were analyzed as various forms of performative enactment of the state's "I." Indeed, foreign policy suggests a moment of crisis, since the identity of the state comes into question or is even challenged in the face of problems, dangers, or threats posed from the "outside" (Weber 1998, 92-3). It is in this critical instance that the state reasserts its identity and thus reenacts its subjectivity, whereby the state is reinscribed into the world in which it lives. Foreign policy, in this sense, points to a moment of challenge and at the same time a moment of reenactment. Foreign policy is a site where the state's identity-making "performance" takes place.

The present study has conducted an analysis of Japanese foreign policy from this perspective. In Japan, national identity has been an important issue since Japan was defeated by the United States and its imperial era was forced to end. As a country responsible for colonizing fellow Asian nations but also having to face the harsh realities of defeat, Japan has long struggled with the contradictory domestic image of its national self as a victim and the regional perception of Japan as an aggressor. Through a series of diplomatic issues with the United States and Asian states, in relation to which these conflicting identities emerge, Japan has tried to create a new self as an honorable and respectable identity, while also recreating the past selves as temporal others and thereby ejecting the "evil" and at times the "feminized" elements that inhabit these degraded past others.

This dissertation has revealed this practice of constructing a "new Japan" by exploring two key sites of Japan's identity formation: (1) the Okinawa problem, where the boundaries between Japan and the victorious United States are constantly negotiated; and (2) the comfort women issue, whereby Japan has struggled to overcome the lingering dishonorable image of itself given by Asian victims. As I have discussed in this dissertation, both of these foreign policy issues have constituted critical sites where postwar Japan's spatial, temporal, and ethical identity has been discursively produced. Each of these issues also represents the haunting legacy of World War II that Japan seeks to overcome in order to become a new self. In each case, though, Japan's projected identity as a respectable, independent, and moral state has been challenged by the presence of the victorious United States or the victimized Asia. In the Okinawan case, and although Okinawa provides the foundation for the security alliance or "partnership" between Japan and the United States, the continued presence of the US military serves as a reminder of Japan's miserable defeat in the Pacific War and its ongoing subjugation to a foreign power, something that was symbolized in repeated US military rapes of Okinawan girls. Rape victims whose internal space was brutally violated by American GIs became symbols of Japan's victimhood, whereby the haunting ghost of Japan's emasculated past was recreated as a shadow of Japan's reconstructed masculine identity. In the comfort women case, Japan has been haunted by Asian female victims of wartime militarist Japan, who problematize postwar Japan's proclaimed moral identity. These women indeed signify the brutal nature of wartime Japan that destroyed Asia.

These issues suggest that Japan has continued to struggle with war memories as both a victim and a former assailant. Thus, honorable representations of postwar Japan are always challenged by the presence of the victorious United States or the victimized Asia. However, what is indeed haunting postwar Japan is past Japan itself. Okinawa's continued victimhood constitutes a living ghost of Japan's deplorable past as a defeated and occupied state, while former comfort women recreate the haunting ghost of Japan's past as an immoral aggressor. Thus, at stake in these foreign policy issues for Japan are the discursive construction of a new Japan and the re-inscription of the boundaries between past Japan and contemporary Japan. In other words, Japanese foreign policy toward these issues is a performance designed to reenact a new Japan and, thereby, to make the evil or defeated past self a temporal other. It is through the continuous construction of past selves as temporal others and the immediate negation of them that reborn Japan is constructed and the boundaries between the new Japan and the former Japan are maintained.

Yet, I also argued, particularly in Chapter V, that, in order to become a new self, Japan actually needs this shadow, the shadow that represents what Japan “was” but also what Japan “is not.” The haunting legacies of the war are, in this respect, a condition of possibility for the “reborn Japan.” However, at the same time, the legacies also destabilize the very identity of the new Japan by remaking the past issue a contemporary problem and ultimately disrupting the temporal boundary of the new Japan. The past selves, accordingly, construct and simultaneously threaten Japan’s new masculine and pacifist identity.

Japanese foreign policy is, thus, an ongoing struggle to reenact a new Japan. It is in this struggle that pacifist postwar Japan can be articulated and exist as a “social fact.” If we view Japanese foreign policy in this way, it then becomes possible to examine various Japanese foreign policy agendas from this new perspective and interpret them in the context of this performative construction of postwar Japan. As briefly mentioned in Chapter III, Japan has been making extensive efforts toward international peace and stability. Japan has recently shown a growing commitment to global issues by expanding economic assistance to developing states, deepening its alliance with the United States, and joining United Nations' activities. Notable is Japan's decision to start to participate in UN peacekeeping operations in 1992, whereby Japan allowed its Self Defense Forces to be dispatched overseas such as Cambodia, East Timor, and the Golan Height. This decision marked a turning point in Japanese foreign policy in that the Japanese pacifist Constitution places strict limitations on the use of force as a means of resolving international disputes. Thus, the role of the Japanese Self Defense Forces had been traditionally restricted to "territorial defense," which had made the overseas dispatch of the SDF a "taboo" in Japan. That is to say, as Masaru Tamamoto notes, "the inability to threaten other countries militarily came to be understood as Japan's contribution to world peace" (1994, 92). In fact, and somewhat ironically, while the Japanese Constitution "is internationalist, proclaiming the construction of world peace as the national mission[,] [...] instead of participating in the international political realm to realize its constitutional ideal, Japan used the Constitution to shield itself from international politics" (Tamamoto 1994, 92; also see Ito 2007, 78-9). As a consequence, Japan's proclaimed UN-centered diplomacy did not lead to its active involvement in any UN peacekeeping operations outside Japan. Japan instead focused on economic assistance and used it as a way of contributing to international development and prosperity.

However, in 1992, the Japanese Diet passed the so-called PKO Law (International Peace Cooperation Law) through which Japan paved the way for more active involvement in UN peacekeeping activities. Under conditions in which five basic principles would be met,⁶⁵ Japan sent its troops to Cambodia (UNCTAD), Mozambique (ONUMOZ), the Golan Heights (UNDOF), and some other parts of the world. These guidelines were set in order to put limitations on the SDF's peacekeeping activities by allowing Japan's participation in those missions authorized by, and conducted within, the framework of the United Nations only. Indeed, "for the assertive pacifist Japan that had desired to contribute substantially to world affairs through nonmilitary means, the UN provided an ideal forum in which to carry out its global responsibility and to enhance its status and prestige" (Ito 2007, 76). More recently, Japan has also passed "the Anti-Terrorism Special Measures Law" (in 2001) in order to dispatch the SDF to the Indian Ocean and thereby support US efforts in Afghanistan. This law made it possible for Japan to participate in activities outside the scope of narrowly defined UN peacekeeping operations. The Anti-Terrorism Special Measures Law was, however, a temporal law and abolished in 2010, while the PKO Law is a permanent one and still provides the basis for overseas dispatch of the SDF. Japan continues to show interest in acting within the framework of the United Nations, which establishes the legitimacy of SDF's activities abroad.

To note, Japan's international contribution has been repeatedly discussed in official documents and statements for a long time (Kohno 2007; Murakami 2008). Japan has long positioned Official Development Assistance (ODA) at the core of its international contributions, and thus “the idea of international contribution has been closely linked with Japan’s ODA program” (Kohno 2007, 25). But it was during and after the First Gulf War that the discussion was vigorously conducted in terms of “human contributions,” more specifically, SDF’s actual participation in UN peacekeeping operations. Many scholars explain Japan’s move toward bolder approaches to international security and stability in the context of “external pressures” (Ikudame 2004, 267; Iokibe 1999, 236-7). In fact, since Japan became a member of the United Nations, political leaders had explored the possibility of SDF’s involvement in peacekeeping operations, which they nevertheless could not realize because of strong opposition from Japanese society (Kohno 2007; Murakami 2008; Sakaguchi 1999; Shoji 2010). Scholars assert that it was a great shock for Japan that its monetary contribution at the time of the Gulf War, although covering almost one-third of the coalition’s spending on military operations, was not only criticized for being “too little, too late,” but also was not even thanked by Kuwait. This was indeed a shock since the Kuwaiti government nonetheless appreciated other states for sending troops to the area. Many scholars argue that, awakened by this “Iraqi shock,” Japanese political leaders and bureaucrats “recognized that the traditional economic diplomacy could not be substituted for the maintenance of a security agenda” (Ito 2007, 76). Thus, in response to international pressure, US pressure in particular, Japan made a historic step toward authorizing the overseas dispatch of the SDF and actively participating in UN peacekeeping operations.

⁶⁵ The five PKO principles include: (1) "the parties to a conflict agree to, and maintain, a cease-fire"; (2) "the parties in the conflict must consent to the deployment of a peacekeeping unit and to Japan's involvement"; (3) "any peacekeeping operations in which Japan is involved must maintain strict impartiality and neutrality"; (4) Japan can withdraw "from the contingent peacekeeping activities, if any of the prior three requirements [...] fails or ceases to be satisfied; and (5) "corps personnel and SDF units participating in peacekeeping operations may use weapons at the minimum level [for self-defense]" (Ito 2007, 85, 86, 87). These conditions were devised so that the PKO Law does not infringe on the Constitution. Further, the SDF can be dispatched only to participate in nonmilitary activities led by the UN.

In addition to this argument, various explanations about Japan’s recent policy toward UN peacekeeping operations have been offered. This new move can also be viewed, for example, as a result of change in domestic norms, from the dominance of antimilitarism to a more nuanced balance between antimilitarism and liberal internationalism (Fujishige 2008), or as a sign of Japan's realist turn (Ikudame 2004, 275). While these arguments are plausible, Japan's move toward more active involvement in the United Nations can also be explained in terms of its performative construction as a reborn self, as discussed throughout this dissertation. In fact, we should remember that the politicization of the two issues discussed in this dissertation, the issues of the comfort women and of US military rapes of Okinawan girls, occurred in the 1990s, when the PKO Law was also enacted in Japan. While the rapes have become highly political since the 1995 incident, the rise of new discourses about the comfort women around 1990 made it possible to transform this wartime issue into a contemporary problem of international significance. That is to say, almost 50 years after the war, Japan experienced a new wave of postwar issues both as a former aggressor and as a loser/victim. As suggested, these issues not only showed the resilience of war memories in Japan as well as in Asia, but they also indicated the conflicted and unsettled identity of Japan. As I have argued, as a fragmented subject, Japan has reasserted its new identity by dealing with a series of problems that emerged as the haunting legacy of World War II. Japan's evolving policy toward UN peacekeeping operations can thus be understood in the context of Japan's continuing struggles for identity, or of Japan's performance to create the reality of a "new Japan."

Indeed, as a state rehabilitated and rebuilt as a pacifist nation after the war, what was at stake in the long debate over Japan's participation in UN peacekeeping operations was not only the limited scope of the Japanese Constitution, but also the question of how postwar Japan could play an international role in a way that is "appropriate" for reborn

Japan (Murakami 2008). As mentioned above, Japan's international contribution has been one of the core agendas in Japanese foreign policy in the postwar era, especially after Japan achieved its economic miracle and regained a sense of pride. International contributions are a way for Japan to performatively (re)make itself as a truly international, pacifist state and, thus, to become a respected member of the international community. Therefore, the issue of Japan's international contributions is also a question of identity for Japan. It is a way for Japan to differentiate itself from the past self once again and to overcome its haunting shadow that insists on bringing Japan back to a past reality that attaches Japan to the image of a barbarian aggressor in Asia. Pacifist Japan is, in this sense, not the foundation of Japan's internationalist policy, but "is performatively constituted by the very expressions that are said to be its result" (Weber 1998, 90).

This point is clearly shown in diplomatic bluebooks published in recent years. Japan's diplomatic bluebook issued after the enactment of the PKO law (MOFA 1993), for example, states that the involvement in UN peacekeeping operations constitutes Japan's "active contribution to world peace and security." Further, as a result of the participation, Japan "contributed to the realization of peace" and "was highly appreciated by the international community." The bluebook, thus, concludes that Japan's peacekeeping activities are significant in that Japan can now "play a global role for world peace and security."

These expressions of Japan's contribution to world peace and its growing international responsibility have repeatedly appeared in bluebooks since 1993. These bluebooks continue to construct Japan as a responsible, pacifist subject vis-à-vis the international community and, thereby, seek to reproduce "reborn pacifist Japan."

Although wartime militarist Japan brought misery to Asia, based on the reflection on the past, Japan now actively tries to create peace in the world and to help others who are struggling to reconstruct their country. Also, through overcoming postwar devastation, occupation, and the 30-year separation of Okinawa, Japan learned the evil of war and now strives to make the world safer and more peaceful. In other words, both as a former assailant and as a defeated nation, UN peacekeeping operations provide a perfect place where Japan can articulate a new self while even sublimating these conflicted identities. Indeed, Japan's past makes contemporary Japan's international contribution important and meaningful, while, by making international contributions, Japan can reproduce the boundaries between an old Japan and a new Japan. Therefore, three different issues discussed in this dissertation, the issues of the comfort women, Okinawa, and Japan's recent active international contributions, all can be understood as part of Japan's ongoing struggle for identity and, thus, as Japan's continuing performance to create or recreate "postwar Japan." Pacifist Japan is, thus, a performative construction. A new Japan is constructed through performance that gives it a reality as a respectable, honorable state.

REFERENCES

- Abe, Yoshishige et al. 1966. Chugaku shakai 2: Rekishiteki bunya [Junior High School Social Studies 2: History]. Tokyo: Nihon Shoseki.
- Abe, Yoshishige, and Katsuta Shuichi. 1955. Chugukusei no shakai: Jidai to seikatsu ge: Rekichi-teki naiyo wo shu to suru mono [Junior High School Social Studies: Eras and Lives 2nd vol.: History]. Tokyo Nihon Shoseki.
- Aldous, Christopher. 2003. "Achieving Reversion: Protest and Authority in Okinawa, 1952-70." Modern Asian Studies 37 (2): 485-508.
- Anand, Dibyesh. 2008. "'Porno-nationalism' and the Male Subject." In Rethinking the Man Question: Sex, Gender and Violence in International Relations, eds, Jane L. Parpart and Marysia Zalewski. London: Zedbooks.
- Angst, Linda Isako. 1997. "Gendered Nationalism: The Himeyuri Story and Okinawan Identity in Postwar Japan." PoLAR: Political and Legal Anthropology Review 20 (1): 100-13.
- . 2003. "The Rape of a Schoolgirl: Discourses of Power and Women's Lives in Okinawa." In Islands of Discontent: Okinawan Responses to Japanese and American Power, eds. Laura Hein and Mark Selden. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Asian Women's Fund [AWF]. 1995. "Ajia josei kikin setsuritsu ni attate no kokumin he no yobikake" [Appeal for Donations for the Asian Women's Fund]. July 18. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-08.html> (December 27, 2012).
- . n.d.a. "How Did the Comfort Women Issue Come to Light?" <http://www.awf.or.jp/e2/survey.html> (December 27, 2012).
- . n.d.b "Establishment of the AW Fund, and the Basic Nature of Its Projects." <http://www.awf.or.jp/2/foundation.html> (December 27, 2012).
- Ashizawa, Kuniko. 2008. "When Identity Matters: State Identity, Regional Institution-Building, and Japanese Foreign Policy." International Studies Review 10: 571-98.
- Atsuta, Isao et al. 1997. Chugaku shakai: Rekishiteki bunya [Junior High School Social Studies: History]. Osaka: Osaka Shoseki.
- . et al. 2002. Chugaku shakai: Rekishiteki bunya [Junior High School Social Studies: History]. Osaka: Osaka Shoseki.

- Bar-Tal, Danel. 2000. Shared Beliefs in a Society: Social Psychological Analysis. London: Sage.
- Beckman, Peter R., and Francine D'Amico, eds. 1994. Women, Gender, and World Politics: Perspectives, Policies, and Prospects. Westport, CT: Bergin and Garvey.
- Benton, Sarah. 1998. "Founding Fathers and Earth Mothers: Women's Place at the 'Birth' of Nations." In Gender, Ethnicity and Political Ideology, eds. Nickie Charles and Helen Hintjens. London: Routledge.
- Berger, Thomas U. 1996a. "Unsheathing the Sword? Germany's and Japan's Fractured Political-Military Cultures and the Problem of Burden-Sharing." World Affairs 158 (4): 174-91.
- . 1996b. "Norms, Identity, and National Security in Germany and Japan." In The Culture of National Security: Norms and Identity in World Politics, ed. Peter J. Katzenstein. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 1998. Cultures of Antimilitarism: National Security in Germany and Japan. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- . 2007. "The Pragmatic Liberalism of an Adoptive State." In Japan in International Politics: The Foreign Policies of an Adoptive State, eds. Thomas U. Berger, Mike M. Michizuki, and Jitsuo Tsuchiyama. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Blechinger, Verena, and Jochen Legewie. 2000. Facing Asia: Japan's Role in the Political and Economic Dynamism of Regional Cooperation. Munchen: Iudicium.
- Brooks, Stephen. 1997. "Dueling Realism." International Organization 51 (3): 445-78.
- Bukh, Alexander. 2007. "Japan's History Textbooks Debate: National Identity in Narratives of Victimhood and Victimization." Asian Survey 47 (5): 683-704.
- Buruma, Ian. 1994. The Wages of Guilt: Memories of War in Germany and Japan. New York: Farrar Straus Giroux.
- Butler, Judith. 1990. Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity. London: Routledge.
- . 2009. Frames of War: When Is Life Grievable? London: Verso.
- Caiger, John. 1968. "The Aims and Content of School Courses in Japanese History, 1982-1945." In Japan's Modern Century: A Special Issue of Monumenta Nipponica Prepared in Celebration of the Centennial of the Meiji Restoration, ed. Edmund Skrzypczak. Rutland, VT: Charles E. Tuttle.

- Calder, Kent E. 1988. "Japanese Foreign Economic Policy Formation: Explaining the Reactive State." World Politics 40 (4): 517-41.
- Campbell, David. 1992. Writing Security: United States Foreign Policy and the Politics of Identity. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- . 1994. "Foreign Policy and Identity: Japanese "Other"/American "Self." In The Global Economy as Political Space, eds. Stephen J. Rosow, Naeem Inayatullah, and Mark Rupert. Boulder: Lynne Miller.
- . 1998. National Deconstruction: Violence, Identity, and Justice in Bosnia. Minneapolis: Minnesota University Press.
- . 2003. "Salgado and the Sahel: Documentary Photography and the Imagining of Famine." In Rituals of Mediation: International Politics and Social Meaning, eds. Francois Debrix and Cynthia Weber. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- . 2007. "Poststructuralism." In International Relations Theories: Discipline and Diversity, eds. Timothy Dunne, Milja Kurki, and Steve Smith. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Chai, Sun-Ki. 1997. "Entrenching the Yoshida Defense Doctrine." International Organization 51 (3): 389-412.
- Charles, Nickie, and Helen Hintjens. 1998. "Gender, Ethnicity and Cultural Identity: Womens 'Places.'" In Gender, Ethnicity and Political Ideologie, eds. Nickie Charles and Helen Hintjens. London: Routledge.
- Cheng, Chu-Yuan. 2007. "Sino-Japanese Economic Relations: Interdependence and Conflict." In China and Japan at Odds: Deciphering the Perpetual Conflict, ed. James C. Hsiung. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Clark, Cal. 2007. "The Evolving Global and Regional Economic Roles of China and Japan: Competitive and Complementary Forces." In China and Japan at Odds: Deciphering the Perpetual Conflict, ed. James C. Hsiung. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Copelon, Rhonda. 1994. "Surfacing Gender: Reconceptualizing Crimes against Women in the Time of War." In Mass Rape: The War Against Women in Bosnia-Herzegovina, ed. Alexandra Stiglmayer. Trans. Marion Faber. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Cohn, Carol. 1987. "Sex and Death in the Rational World of Defense Intellectuals." Signs, Journal of Women in Culture and Society 12 (4): 687-718.

Connolly, William E. 1991. Identity/Difference: Democratic Negotiations of Political Paradox. Ithaca, Y: Cornell University Press.

Coomaraswamy, Rhadika. 1996. "Report on the Mission to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the Republic of Korea and Japan on the Issue of Military Sexual Slavery in Wartime." January 4. <http://www.unhchr.ch/Huridocda/Huridoca.nsf/0/b6ad5f3990967f3e802566d600575fcb?Opendocument> (December 27, 2012).

Cooney, Kevin. 2007. Japan's Foreign Policy Since 1945. New York: M.E. Sharp.

Debrix, Francois. 2003a. "Language, Nonfoundationalism, International Relations." In Language, Agency, and Politics in a Constructed World, ed. Francois Debrix. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

———, ed. 2003b. Language, Agency, and Politics in a Constructed World. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe

Der Derian, James, and Michael Shapiro. 1989. International/Intertextual Relations: Postmodern Readings of World Politics. Lexington: Lexington Books.

Dittmer, Jason. 2005. "Captain America's Empire: Reflections on Identity, Popular Culture, and Post-9/11 Geopolitics." Annals of the Association of American Geographers 95 (3): 626-43.

Doty, Roxanne Lynn. 1993. "Foreign Policy as Social Construction: A Post-Positivist Analysis of U.S. Counterinsurgency Policy in the Philippines." International Studies Quarterly 37 (3): 297-320.

———. 1996. Imperial Encounters: The Politics of Representation in North-South Relations. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

———. 2000. "Desire All the Way Down." Review of International Studies 26 (1): 137-39.

Dower, John W. 1999. Embracing Defeat: Japan in the Wake of World War II. New York: W.W. Norton & Company.

Edkins, Jenny, and Veronique Pin-Fat. 1999. "The Subject of the Political." In Sovereignty and Subjectivity, eds. Jenny Edkins, and Nalini Persram, and Veronique Pin-Fat. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.

Eldridge, Robert D. 2001. The Origin of the Bilateral Okinawa Problem: Okinawa in Postwar U.S.-Japan Relations, 1945-1952. New York: Garland Publishing.

- Elshtain, Jean Bethke. 1997. Real Politics: At the Center of Everyday Life. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Enloe, Cynthia. 1990. Bananas, Bases and Beaches: Making Feminist Sense of International Politics. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Epstein, Charlotte. 2011. "Who Speaks? Discourse, the Subject and the Study of Identity in International Politics." European Journal of International Relations 17 (2): 327-50.
- Escobar, Arturo. 1995. Encountering Development: The Making and Unmaking of the Third World. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Fierke, K. M. 1996. "Multiple Identities, Interfacing Games: The Social Construction of Western Action in Bosnia." European Journal of International Relations 2 (4), 467-97.
- . 2003. "Breaking the Silence: Language and Method in International Relations" In Language, Agency, and Politics in a Constructed World, ed. Francois Debrix. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- . 2007. "Constructivism." In International Relations Theories: Discipline and Diversity, eds. Timothy Dunne, Milja Kurki, and Steve Smith. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Fujioka, Nobukatsu. 1996. Ojoku no kingendaishi: Ima, kokufuku no toki [Disgraceful Modern and Contemporary History: Now is the Time to Overcome]. Tokyo: Tokuma Shoten.
- Fujishige, Hiromi. 2008. "Reisengo ni okeru jieitai no yakuwari to sono henyō: Kihanno sokoku to siyo, soshite 'sekkyoku shugi' he no tenkai" [The Changing Role of the Japan's Self Defense Forces after the Cold War: The Norm-Shift and the Rise of "Activism"]. Kokusei seiji 154: 95-114.
- Funabashi, Yoichi. 1991/1992. "Japan and the New World Order." Foreign Policy 70 (5): 58-74.
- Furuki, Toshiaki. 2003. "Considering Okinawa as a Frontier." In Japan and Okinawa: Structure and Subjectivity, eds. Glenn D. Hook and Richard Siddle. London: RoutledgeCurzon.
- Gabe, Masaaki. 2004. "Beigun gunji kichi to Okinawa: 1945 nen kara konnichi made" [US Military Bases and Okinawa: From 1945 to Today]. In Nihon gaiko no aidentiti [Identity of Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Yuichi Hasegawa. Tokyo: Nansosha.
- Gatens, Moira. 1996. Imaginary Bodies: Ethics, Power and Corporeality. London: Routledge.

- Gerson, Joseph. 1996. "I Refuse." Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists 52: 26.
- Gould, Harry D. 2009. "International Criminal Bodies." Review of International Studies 35: 701-21.
- Green, Michael. 2001. Japan's Reluctant Realism: Foreign Policy Challenge in an Era of Uncertain Power. New York: Palgrave.
- Greenhill, Brian. 2008. "Recognition and Collective Identity Formation in International Politics." European Journal of International Relations 14 (2): 348-68.
- Grant, Rebecca. 1991. "The Sources of Gender Bias in International Relations Theory." In Gender and International Relations, eds. Rebecca Grant and Kathleen Newland. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Halliday, Fred. 1991. "Hidden from International Relations: Women and the International Arena." In Gender and International Relations, eds. Rebecca Grant and Kathleen Newland. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Hansen, Lene. 2006. Security as Practice: Discourse Analysis and the Bosnian War. London: Routledge.
- Hashimoto, Ryutaro. 1996. "Moto ianfu no katagata he no naikaku sori daijin no owabi no tegami" [Letter from Prime Minister to the Former Comfort Women]. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-12.html> (December 27, 2012).
- Hata, Ikuhiko. 1999. Ianfu to senjo no sei [Comfort Women and the Sexuality on the Battlefield]. Tokyo: Shincho Sensho.
- Hayashi, Hiroshi. 2006. "Higashi Ajia no beigun-kichi to seibaibai • seihanzai" [US Military Bases in East Asia, Prostitution, and Sexual Crimes]. Americashi Kenkyu 29: 1-18.
- Heginbotham, Eric, and Richard J. Samuels. 1998. "Mercantile Realism and Japanese Foreign Policy." International Security 22 (4): 171-203.
- Hellmann, Donald C. 1972. "The Confrontation with 'Realpolitik.'" In Forecast for Japan: Security in the 1970s, ed. James William Morley. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- . 1988. "Japanese Politics and Foreign Policy: Elitist Democracy Within an American Green House." In The Political Economy of Japan vol. 2: The Changing International Context, eds. Takashi Inoguchi and Daniel I. Okimoto. Berkeley, CA: Stanford University Press, 1988.

Hicks, George L. 1995. The Comfort Women: Japan's Brutal Regime of Enforced Prostitution in the Second World War. New York: W.W. Norton & Co.

Hirata, Keiko. 2001. "Cautious Proactive and Reluctant Reactivism: Analyzing Japan's Foreign Policy toward Indochina." In Japanese Foreign Policy in Asia and the Pacific: Domestic Interests, American Pressure, and Regional Integration, eds. Akitoshi Miyashita and Yoichiro Sato. New York: Palgrave.

Hook, Glenn D., and Richard Siddle. 2003. "Introduction: Japan? Structure and Subjectivity in Okinawa." In Japan and Okinawa: Structure and Subjectivity, eds. Glenn D. Hook and Richard Siddle. London: RoutledgeCurzon.

Hook, Glenn D., Julie Gilson, Christopher W. Hughes, and Hugo Dobson. 2001. Japan's International Relations: Politics, Economics, and Security. London: Routledge.

Horio, Teruhisa, and Steven Platzer. 1988. Educational Thought and Ideology in Modern Japan: State Authority and Intellectual Freedom. Tokyo: University of Tokyo Press.

Howe, Christopher. 1996. "China, Japan and Economic Interdependence in the Asia Pacific Region." In China and Japan: History, Trends, and Prospects, ed. Christopher Howe. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1993. "Why International Primacy Matters." International Security 17 (4): 68-83.

Ikudame, Manabu. 2004. "Sengo nihon ni okeru anzen hosho seisaku to aidentiti" [Security Policy and Identity of Postwar Japan]. In Nihon gaiko no aidentiti [Identity of Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Yuichi Hasegawa. Tokyo: Nansosha.

Inoguchi, Takashi. 1986. "Japan's Images and Options: Not a Challenger but a Supporter." Journal of Japanese Studies 12 (1): 95-119.

Inoguchi, Takashi and Purnendra Jain, eds. 2000. Japanese Foreign Policy Today: A Reader. New York: Palgrave.

Ibata, Masayuki. 2010. "San Furanshisuko taisei to Okinawa: Kichi mondai no genten wo kangaeru" [On the structure of the San Francisco Peace Treaty and Okinawa]. Ritsumeikan Hogaku 5/6: 1576-599.

Ikeda, Sogo. 2004. "Sengo nichibei kankei ni okeru nihon gaiko no aidentiti" [Identity of Japanese Foreign Policy on Postwar Relations with the US]. In Nihon gaiko no aidentiti [Identity of Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Yuichi Hasegawa. Tokyo: Nansosha.

Inoue, Masamichi S. 2007. Okinawa and the U.S. Military: Identity Making in the Age of Globalization. New York: Columbia University Press.

Iokibe, Makoto. 1999. "Reisengo no nihon gaiko" [Japanese Foreign Policy After the Cold War]. In Sengo nihon gaiko-shi [Postwar Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Iokibe Makoto. Tokyo: Yuhikaku Arma.

Ito, Go. 2007. "Participating in UN Peacekeeping Operations." In Japan in International Politics: The Foreign Policies of an Adaptive State, eds. Thomas U. Berger, Mike M. Mochizuki, and Jitsuo Tsuchiyama. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.

Jeans, Roger B. 2005. "Victims or Victimizers? Museums, Textbooks, and the War Debate in Contemporary Japan." The Journal of Military History 69 (1): 149-95.

Jepperson, Ronald L., Alexander Wendt, and Peter J. Katzenstein. 1996. "Norms, Identity, and Culture in National Security." In The Culture of National Security: Norms and Identity in World Politics, ed. Peter J. Katzenstein. New York: Columbia University Press.

Johnson, Chalmers. 1993. "The State and Japanese Grand Strategy." In The Domestic Bases of Grand Strategy, eds. Richard Rosecrance and Arthur A. Stein. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

Kahn, Herman. 1970. The Emerging Japanese Superstate: Challenge and Response. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall.

Kato, Koichi. 1992. "Chosen hanto shusshinsha no iwayuru jugun ianfu mondai ni kansuru naikaku kanbo chokan happyo" [Statement by Chief Cabinet Secretary Koichi Kato on the Issue of the So-called "War-time Comfort Women" from the Korean Peninsula]. July 6. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-01.html> (December 27, 2012).

Katzenstein, Peter J. 1996a. Cultural Norms and National Security: Police and Military in Postwar Japan. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.

———, ed. 1996b. The Culture of National Security: Norms and Identity in World Politics. New York: Columbia University Press.

———. 1996c. "Introduction: Alternative Perspectives on National Security." In The Culture of National Security: Norms and Identity in World Politics, ed. Peter J. Katzenstein. New York: Columbia University Press.

Katzenstein, Peter J., Robert O. Keohane, and Stephen D. Krasner. 1998. "International Organization and the Study of World Politics." International Organization 52 (4): 645-85.

Katzenstein, Peter J., and Nobuo Okawara. 1993. "Japan's National Security: Structures, Norms, and Policies." International Security 17 (4): 84-118.

- . 2001/2002. “Japan, Asia-Pacific Security, and the Case for Analytical Eclecticism.” International Security 26 (3): 153-85.
- Kaufman, Joyce P., and Kristen P. Williams. 2007. Women, the State, and War: A Comparative Perspective on Citizenship and Nationalism. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books.
- Kawasaki, Tsuyoshi. 2001. “Postclassical Realism and Japanese Security Policy.” The Pacific Review 14 (2): 221-40.
- Keohane, Robert O. 1988. “International Institutions: Two Approaches.” International Studies Quarterly 32 (4): 379-96.
- Kim, Hyun Sook. 1997. “History and Memory: The ‘Comfort Women’ Controversy.” Positions: East Asia Cultures Critique 5 (1): 73-106.
- Kimura, Maki. 2008. “Narrative as a Site of Subject Construction: The ‘Comfort Women’ Debate.” Feminist Theory 9 (5): 5-24.
- Kitamura, Tsuyoshi. 2009. Shisha-tachi no sengo-shi: Okinawasen wo meguru hitobito no kioku [A Postwar Ethnography of the War Dead in Okinawa]. Tokyo: Ochanomizu Shobo.
- Kiuchi, Shinzo, Nishioka Toranosuke, Arisawa Hiromi et al. 1966. Atarashii shakai 2 [New History 2]. Tokyo: Tokyo Shoseki.
- Kobayashi, Yoshinori. 1997. Shin Gomanizumu Sengen 3 [New Arrogant Declaration 3]. Tokyo: Shogakukan.
- Kodama, Kota et al. 1952. Chugakusei no Rekishi [History for Junior High School Students]. Tokyo: Nihon Shoseki.
- Kodama, Kota, and Minegishi Kentaro et al. 1997. Chugaku shakai: Rekishiteki bunya [Junior High School Social Studies: History]. Tokyo: Nihon Shoseki.
- . et al. 2002. Watashitachi no chugaku shakai: Rekishiteki bunya [Our Junior High School Social Studies: History]. Tokyo: Nihon Shoseki.
- Kofman, Eleonore. 1998. “When Society Was Simple: Gender and Ethnic Divisions and the Far and New Right in France.” In Gender, Ethnicity and Political Ideologies, eds. Nickie Charles and Helen Hintjens. London: Routledge.
- Kohno, Masaru. 2007. “The Domestic Foundations of Japan’s International Contribution.” In Japan in International Politics: The Foreign Policies of an Adaptive

State, eds. Thomas U. Berger, Mike M. Mochizuki, and Jitsuo Tsuchiyama. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.

Kono, Yohei. 1992. "Ianfu kankei chosa kekksa happyo ni kansuru naikaku kanbo chokan danwa" [Statement by Chief Cabinet Secretary Yohei Kono on the Result of the Study on the Issue of "Comfort Women"]. July 6. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-02.html> (December 27, 2012).

Kovner, Sarah. 2009. "Base Cultures: Sex Workers and Servicemen in Occupied Japan." The Journal of Asian Studies 68 (3): 777-804.

Kowert, Paul. 1998. "Agent versus Structure in the Construction of National Identity." In International Relations in a Constructed World, eds. Vendulka Kubalkova, Nicholas Onuf, and Paul Kowert. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Kubalkova, Vendulka, ed. 2001. Foreign Policy in a Constructed World. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Kubálková, Vendulka, Nicholas Onuf, and Paul Kowert, eds. 1998. International Relations in a Constructed World. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Laurence, Henry. 2007. "Japan's Proactive Foreign Policy and the Rise of the BRICs." Asian Perspective 31 (4): 177-203.

Lincoln, Edward J. 1993-1994. "Japan: Using Power Narrowly." The Washington Quarterly 27 (1): 111-27.

Levin, Norman D. 1993. "The Strategic Dimensions of Japanese Foreign Policy." In Japan's Foreign Policy After the Cold War: Coping with Change, ed. Gerald L. Curtis. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Long, William J. 2001. "Nonproliferation as a Goal of Japanese Foreign Assistance." In Japanese Foreign Policy in Asia and the Pacific: Domestic Interests, American Pressure, and Regional Integration, eds. Akitoshi Miyashita and Yoichi Sato. New York: Palgrave.

March, James G. and Johan P. Olsen. 1989. Rediscovering Institutions. New York: Free Press.

Maswood, Javed S., ed. 2001. Japan and East Asian Regionalism. London: Routledge.

Matsumoto, Hideki. 2004. "Okinawa ni okeru beigun kichi mondai: Sono rekishi teki keii to genjo" [The US Military Bases Issue in Okinawa: Its Historical Background and the Reality]. Refarensu 7: 36-60.

- Mayer, Tamar. 2000. "Gender Ironies of Nationalism: Setting the Stage." In Gender Ironies of Nationalism: Sexing the Nation, ed. Tamar Mayer. London: Routledge.
- McClintock, Anne. 1995. Imperial Leather: Race, Gender and Sexuality in the Colonial Contest. London: Routledge.
- McCormack, Gavan. 2000. "The Japanese Movement to 'Correct' History." In Censoring History: Citizenship and Memory in Japan, Germany, and the United States, eds. Laura Elizabeth Hein and Mark Selden. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- McDougall, Gay J. 1998. "Contemporary Forms of Slavery: Systematic Rape, Sexual Slavery and Slavery-like Practices during Armed Conflict." June 22. <http://www.unhcr.ch/Huridocda/Huridoca.nsf/7fba5363523b20cdc12565a800312a4b/3d25270b5fa3ea998025665f0032f220?OpenDocument#IIIA> (February 28).
- Mearsheimer, John J. 1994/95. "The False Promise of International Institutions." International Security 19 (3): 5-49.
- Mendoza, Katharina R. 2003. "Freeing the 'Slaves of Destiny': The Lolas of the Filipino Comfort Women Movement." Cultural Dynamics 15 (3): 247-66.
- Mikanagi, Yumiko. 1996. Japan's Trade Policy: Action or Reaction? London: Routledge.
- Milliken, Jennifer. 1999. "The Study of Discourse in International Relations: A Critique of Research and Methods." European Journal of International Relations 5 (2): 225-254.
- Ministry of Defense [MOD]. 1990. Boei hakusho [White Paper on Defense]. http://www.clearing.mod.go.jp/hakusho_data/1990/w1990_00.html (March 28, 2013).
- . 2006. Nihon no boei: Boei hakusho [Defense of Japan: White Paper on Defense]. http://www.clearing.mod.go.jp/hakusho_data/2006/w2006_00.html (March 28, 2013).
- . 2010. Nihon no boei: Boei hakusho [Defense of Japan: White Paper on Defense]. http://www.clearing.mod.go.jp/hakusho_data/2010/w2010_00.html (March 28, 2013).
- Ministry of Foreign Affairs [MOFA]. 1993. Gaiko seisho [Diplomatic Bluebook]. <http://www.mofa.go.jp/mofaj/gaiko/bluebook/1992/h04-contents-4.htm#2-1-1> (March 28, 2013).
- Miyaoka, Isao. 2009. "Nihon no kokka aidentiti no hensen: Conputa shien ni yo ru 'boei hakusho' no naiyo bunseki" [Changes in Japan's State Identities: A Computer-Assisted Content Analysis of Defense White Papers]. Asia Taiheiyo Ronso 18: 103-22.

- Miyashita, Akitoshi. 1999. "Gaiatsu and Japan's Foreign Aid: Rethinking the Reactive-Proactive Debate." International Studies Quarterly 43 (4): 695-731.
- . 2007. "Where do Norms Come from? Foundations of Japan's Postwar Pacifism." International Relations of the Asia-Pacific 7 (1): 99-120.
- Mochizuki, Mike M. 2007. "Japan's Shifting Strategy toward the Rise of China." Journal of Strategic Studies 30 (4/5): 739-76.
- Molasky, Michael S. 1999. The American Occupation of Japan and Okinawa: Literature and Memory. London: Routledge.
- Mori, Katsumi, Takeuchi Rizo, and Fujiki Kunihiro. 1955. Chugaku shakai: Nihon to sekai: Rekishiteki naiyo wo shu to suru mono gekan [Junior High School Social Studies: Japan and the World: History 2nd vol.]. Tokyo: Teikoku Shoin.
- Mostov, Julie. 2000. "Sexing the Nation/Desexing the Body: Politics of National Identity in the Former Yugoslavia." In Gender Ironies of Nationalism: Sexing the Nation, ed. Tamar Mayer. London: Routledge.
- Moon, Katharine H. S. 1997. Sex Among Allies: Military Prostitution in U.S.-Korean Relations. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Murakami, Tomoaki. 2008. "Yoshida rosen to PKO sanku mondai" [The Yoshida Doctrine and the Problem of PKO Participation]. Kokusai seiji 151: 121-39.
- Murayama, Tomiichi. 1994. "Sengo 50 nen ni mukete no Murayama Yomiichi naikaku sori daijin no danwa" [Statement by Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama on the "Peace, Friendship, and Exchange Initiative"]. August 31. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-04.html> (December 27, 2012).
- . 1995. "Ajia josei kikin setsuritsu ni atatte no naikaku sori daijin no aisatsu" [Statement by Prime Minister Tomiichi Murayama on the Occasion of the Establishment of the "Asian Women's Fund"]. July 18. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-081.html> (December 27, 2012).
- . 2007. "Ajia josei kikin kaisan kisha kaiken ni okeru rijicho hastugen yoshi" [The Statement by President of the Asian Women's Fund Murayama at the Final Press Conference]. March 6. <http://www.awf.or.jp/pdf/0209.pdf> (March 15, 2013).
- Naikaku kanbo gaisei shingi shitsu [Cabinet Councilors' Office on External Affairs]. 1993. "Iwayuru jugun ianfu mondai nitsuite" [On the Issue of Wartime 'Comfort Women']. August 4. <http://www.awf.or.jp/6/statement-03.html> (December 27, 2012).

- Nakayama, Ichiro, Sakamoto Taro, Ienaga Saburo, Yoshioka Riki, et al. 1955. Chugakko shakai (rekishit-teki naiyo wo shu to suru mono ge): Kindai shakai no ugoki [Junior High School Social Studies (History 2nd vol.) Changes in Modern Society]. Tokyo: Gakko Tosho.
- Nelson, John K. 2002. "Tempest in a Textbook: A Report on the New Junior High School History Textbook in Japan." Critical Asian Studies 34 (1): 129-48.
- Neumann, Iver B. 1996. Russia and the Idea of Europe: A Study in Identity and International Relations. London: Routledge.
- Niarchos, Catherine N. 2006. "Women, War, and Rape: Challenges Facing the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia." In Women's Rights: A Human Rights Quarterly Reader, ed. Bert B. Lockwood. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Nikolic-Ristanovic, Vesna. 1998. "War, Nationalism and Mothers in the Former Yugoslavia." In The Women and War Reader, eds. Lois Ann Lorentzen and Jennifer Turpin. New York: New York University Press.
- Nishida, Naojiro, and Suzuki Shigetaka. 1966. Chugaku shakaika: Rekishi (shoteiban) [Junior High School Social Studies: History (1st ed.)]. Tokyo: Teikoku Shoin.
- Nishino, Rumiko. 2005. "Kagai no kioku no massatsu to josei besshi" [The Elimination of Memories of Victimization and the Discrimination Against Women]. In Tsukkatara kiken "Tsukuru kai" rekishi • komin kyokasho: Kodomowo senso ni michibiku kyokasho ha iranai [The Danger of Using "Tsukuru Kai" Civics and History Textbooks: We Don't Need Textbooks Guiding Children Toward War], eds. Uesugi Satoshi, Omori Akiko, Takashima Nobuyoshi, and Nishino Rumiko. Tokyo: Akashi Shoten.
- . 2008. "'Ianfu' higaisha no 'songen no kaifuku' to ha nanika? Josei kokusai senpan hotei ga motometa seigi to 'kokumin kikin'" [What Does It Mean to Restore the Dignity of "Comfort Women" Victims? The Justice Sought in the Women's International War Crimes Tribunal and the "People's Fund"]. In Rekishi to sekinin: "ianfu" mondai to 1990-nendai, eds. Kim Puja and Nakano Toshio. Tokyo: Seikyusha.
- Nishio, Kanji and Fujioka Nobukatsu et al. 2002. Chugaku shakai: Atarashii rekishi kyokasho [Junior High School Social Studies: New History Textbooks]. Tokyo: Fusosha.
- Nozaki, Yoshiko. 2005. "Japanese Policies and the History Textbook Controversy, 1945-2001." In History Education and National Identity in East Asia, eds. Edward Vickers and Alisa Jones. New York: Routledge.
- Nozaki, Yoshiko, and Inokuchi Hiromitsu. 2000. "Japanese Education, Nationalism, and Ienaga Saburoo's Textbook Lawsuits" In Censoring History: Citizenship and Memory in Japan, Germany, and the United States, eds. Laura Elizabeth Hein and Mark Selden. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Oga, Toru. 2003. "Nihon gaiko to aidentiti: 'Ajia-Pashifikku' kara 'higashi Ajia' he" [Japanese Foreign Policy and Identity: From "Asia-Pacific" to "East Asia"]. Shakai kagaku kenkyu 54 (2): 127-52.

Oh, Bonnie. B.C. 2001. "The Japanese Imperial System and the Korean 'Comfort Women' of World War II." In Legacies of the Comfort Women of World War II, eds. Margaret Stetz and Bonnie B.C. Oh. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Okinawa kenchiji koshitsu kichi taisaku ka [Okinawa Prefecture Military Base Affairs Division]. 2008. Okinawa no beigun kichi [The U.S. Military Bases in Okinawa]. March. <http://www.pref.okinawa.lg.jp/site/chijiko/kichitai/17870.html> (January 3, 2013).

———. 2012. Okinawa no beigun oyobi jieitai kichi (tokei siryo shu) [US Military and Self Defense Forces Bases in Okinawa (Statistics)]. March. <http://www.pref.okinawa.jp/site/chijiko/kichitai/toukeisiryousyu2403.html> (January 3, 2013).

Omori, Noriko and Kawada Fumiko. 2010. "Ianfu" mondai ga toutekitakoto [Questions Raised by the "Comfort Women" Issue]. Tokyo: Iwanami Bukkuretto.

Onuf, Nicholas. 1989. World of Our Making: Rules and Rule in Social Theory and International Relations. Columbia, SC: University of South Carolina Press.

———. 1998. "Constructivism: A User's Manual." In International Relations in a Constructed World, eds. Vendulka Kubálková, Nicholas Onuf, and Paul Kowert. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.

Omori, Akiko. 2005. "Mushi sareru Okinawa to josei" [Ignoring Okinawa and Women]. In Tsukkatara kiken "Tsukuru kai" rekishi • komin kyokasho: Kodomowo senso ni michibiku kyokasho ha iranai [The Danger of Using "Tsukuru Kai" Civics and History Textbooks: We Don't Need Textbooks Guiding Children Toward War], eds. Uesugi Satoshi, Omori Akiko, Takashima Nobuyoshi, and Nishino Rumiko. Tokyo: Akashi Shoten.

Oros, Andrew. L. 2008. Normalizing Japan: Politics, Identity, and the Evolution of Security Practice. Stanford: Stanford University Press.

Orr, James J. 2001. The Victim as Hero: Ideologies of Peace and National Identity in Postwar Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

Orr, Robert M. Jr. 1990. The Emergence of Japan's Foreign Aid Power. New York: Columbia University Press.

- Osius, Ted. 2002. The U.S.-Japan Security Alliance: Why It Matters and How to Strengthen It. Westport, CT: Praeger.
- Ozawa, Eiichi, and Sano Masanori. 1952. Chugaku Nihonshi [Junior High School Japanese History]. Tokyo: Shimizu Shoin.
- Pharr, Susan. 1993. "Japan's Defensive Foreign Policy and the Politics of Burden Sharing." In Japan's Foreign Policy After the Cold War: Coping with Change, ed. Gerald L. Curtis. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- Peterson, V. Spike. 1998. "Gendered Nationalism." In The Women and War Reader, eds. Lois Ann Lorentzen and Jennifer Turpin. New York: New York University Press.
- Pettman, Jan Jindy. 1996. Worlding Women: A Feminist International Politics. London: Routledge.
- Potter, David and Sueo Sudo. 2003. "Japanese Foreign Policy: No Longer Reactive?" Political Studies Review 1: 317-32.
- Pyle, Kenneth B. 1989. "The Burden of Japanese History and the Politics of Burden Sharing" in Sharing World Leadership? A New Era for America and Japan, eds. John H. Makin and Donald C. Hellmann. Washington D.C.: American Institute for Public Policy Research.
- . 1992. "Can Japan Lead? The New Internationalism and the Burden of History." In Power, Economics, and Security: The United States and Japan in Focus, ed. Henry Bienen. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Reus-Smit, Christian. 2005. "Constructivism." In Theories of International Relations. 3rd ed., eds. Scott Burchill, Andrew Linklater, Richard Devetak, Jack Donnelly, Matthew Paterson, Christian Reus-Smit, and Jacqui True. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Richardson, Bradley. 1997. Japanese Democracy: Power, Coordination, and Performance. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Said, Edward W. 1979. Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.
- Sakaguchi, Kiyoshi. 1999. "Kokuren no shudan anzen hoshō to Nihon: Kokurengun sankā ni kansuru seifu kaishaku no hensen" [UN Collective Security and Japan: The Transformation of the Japanese Government interpretation of Japanese Participation in UN Forces]. Kokusai kōkyō sesaku kenkyū 3 (2): 49-69.
- Sakamoto, Kazuya. 1999. "Dokuritsu-koku no joken: 1950 nendai no nihon gaiko" [The Conditions for Independence State: Japanese Foreign Policy in the 1950s]. In Sengo nihon gaiko-shi [Postwar Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Iokibe Makoto. Tokyo: Yuhikaku Arma.

Salzman, Todd A. 2006. "Rape Camps as a Means of Ethnic Cleansing: Religious, Cultural, and Ethical Responses to Rape Victims in the Former Yugoslavia." In Women's Rights: A Human Rights Quarterly Reader, ed. Bert B. Lockwood. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Sasayama, Haruo et al. 1997. Chugaku shakai: Rekishi [Junior High School Social Studies: History]. Tokyo: Kyoiku Shuppan.

Sato, Yoichi. 2001. "Conclusion: Japan in Asia and the Pacific." In Japanese Foreign Policy in Asia and the Pacific: Domestic Interests, American Pressure, and Regional Integration, eds. Akitoshi Miyashita and Yoichi Sato. New York: Palgrave.

Schoppa, Leonard J. 1997. Bargaining with Japan. New York: Columbia University Press.

Schrijvers, Peter. 2002. The GI War Against Japan: American Soldiers in Asia and the Pacific During World War II. New York: New York University Press.

Seifert, Ruth. 1994. "War and Rape: A Preliminary Analysis." In Mass Rape: The War Against Women in Bosnia-Herzegovina, ed. Alexandra Stiglmeier. Trans. Marion Faber. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.

Shambaugh, David. 1996. "China and Japan Towards the Twenty-First Century: Rivals for Pre-eminence or Complex Interdependence?" In China and Japan at Odds: Deciphering the Perpetual Conflict, ed. James C. Hsiung. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Shapiro, Michael J. 2009. Cinematic Geopolitics. London: Routledge.

Sharp, Joanne P. 1996. "Hegemony, Popular Culture and Geopolitics: The Reader's Digest and the Construction of Danger." Political Geography 15 (6/7): 557-70.

Shimazu, Naoko. 2003. "Popular Representations of the Past: The Case of Postwar Japan." Journal of Contemporary History 38(1): 101-16.

Shoji, Takayuki. 2010. "Takeshita naikaku to kokuren heiwa iji katsudo: Kokuren Namibia dokuritsu gurupu (UNTAG) sanko mondai to gaimusho" [The Takeshita Administration and UN Peacekeeping Operations: The Issue of the United Nations Transition Assistance Group (UNTAG) and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs]. Kokusai seiji 160: 137-51.

- Sjoberg, Laura, and Jessica L. Peet. 2011. "Targeting Civilians in War: Feminist Contributions." In Feminism and International Relations: Conversations About the Past, Present, and Future, eds. J. Ann Tickner and Laura Sjoberg. London: Routledge.
- Smith, Sheila A. 2001. "A Place Apart: Okinawa and Japan's Postwar Peace." In Partnership: The United States and Japan 1951-2001, eds. Akira Iriye and Robert A. Wampler. Tokyo: Kodansha International.
- Smith, Steve. 1996. "Positivism and Beyond." In International Theory: Positivism & Beyond, eds. Steve Smith, Ken Booth, and Marysia Zalewski. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- . 2001a. "Foreign Policy Is What States Make of It: Social Construction and International Relations Theory." In Foreign Policy in a Constructed World, ed. Vendulka Kubalkova. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- . 2000b. "Wendt's World." Review of International Studies 26 (1): 151-63.
- Soeya, Yoshihide. 1998. "Japan: Normative Constraints versus Structural Imperatives." In Asian Security Practice: Material and Ideational Influences, ed. Muthiah Alagappa. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- . 2008. "Yoshida rosen to Yoshida doktorin" [The Yoshida Line and the Yoshida Doctrine]. Kokusai seiji 151: 1-17.
- Soh, Chunghee Sarah. 1996. "The Korean 'Comfort Women': Movement for Redress." Asian Survey 36 (12): 1226-240.
- . 2000. "Human Rights and the 'Comfort Women.'" Peace Review 12 (1): 123-29.
- . 2001. "Prostitutes versus Sex Slaves: The Politics of Representing the 'Comfort Women.'" In Legacies of the Comfort Women of World War II, eds. Margaret Stetz and Bonnie B.C. Oh. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe.
- . 2003. "Japan's National/Asian Women's Fund for 'Comfort Women.'" Pacific Affairs 76 (2): 209-33.
- . 2008. The Comfort Women: Sexual Violence and Postcolonial Memory in Korea and Japan. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Stigl Mayer, Alexander, ed. 1994. Mass Rape: The War Against Women in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Trans. Marion Faber. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Sudo, Sueo. 2007. Kokka no taigai kodou [State's External Behavior]. Tokyo: Tokyo Daigaku Shuppankai.

- Tadokoro, Masayuki. 1999. "Keizai taikoku no gaiko no genkei: 1960 nendai no nihon gaiko" [The Model of Economic Power Diplomacy: Japanese Foreign Policy in the 1960s]. In Sengo nihon gaiko-shi [Postwar Japanese Foreign Policy], ed. Iokibe Makoto. Tokyo: Yuhikaku Arma.
- Tamamoto, Masaru. 1994. "The Ideology of Nothingness." World Policy Journal 11 (1): 89-99.
- Tanabe, Hiroshi et al. 2002. Atarashii shakai: Rekishi [New Social Studies: History]. Tokyo: Tokyo Shoseki.
- Tanaka, Akihiko. 1989. "Nihon gaiko to kokunai seiji no renkan: Gaiatsu no seiji-gaku" [Relations between Japanese Foreign Policy and Domestic Politics: The Politics of External Pressure]. Kokusai mondai 348: 23-36.
- . 2000. "Kokusai seiji riron no sai-kochiku" [Reconstructing International Relations Theory]. Kokusai seiji 124: 1-10.
- Tanaka, Yuki. 2002. Japan's Comfort Women: Sexual Slavery and Prostitution During World War II and the US Occupation. London: Routledge.
- Telhami, Shibley, and Michael Barnett, eds. 2002. Identity and Foreign Policy in the Middle East. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Teruya, Yoshihiko et al. 1997. Shakaika: Chugakusei no rekishi; Nihon no ayumi to sekai no ugoki (shoteiban) [Social Studies: History for Junior High School Students: Japan's Path and Changes in the World (1st ed.)]. Tokyo: Teikoku Shoin.
- Tickner, J. Ann. 1991. "Hans Morgenthau's Principles of Political Realism: A Feminist Reformulation." In Gender and International Relations, eds. Rebecca Grant and Kathleen Newland. Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- . 1992. Gender in International Relations: Feminist Perspectives on Achieving Global Security. New York: Columbia University Press.
- . 1997. "You Just Don't Understand: Troubled Engagements between Feminists and IR Theorists." International Studies Quarterly 41 (4): 611-32.
- . 2001. Gendering World Politics: Issues and Approaches in the Post-Cold War Era. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Tickner, J. Ann, and Laura Sjørberg. 2007. "Feminism." In Theories of International Relations. 3rd ed., eds. Scott Burchill, Andrew Linklater, Richard Devetak, Jack Donnelly, Matthew Paterson, Christian Reus-Smit, and Jacqui True. Basingstoke: Palgrave.

Togo, Kazuhiko. 2005. Japan's Foreign Policy 1945-2003: The Quest for a Proactive Policy. Leiden, The Netherlands: Brill.

True, Jacqui. 1993. "National Selves and Feminine Others." Fletcher F. World Affairs 17: 75-89.

Tsuchiyama, Jitsuo. 1997. "Nichibei domei no kokusai seiji riron: Riarizumu, riberaru seido-ron, konsutorakutivizumu" [International Relations Theories of the U.S.-Japanese Alliance: Views from Realism, Liberal-Institutionalism, and Constructivism]. Kokusai seiji 115: 161-79.

———. 2000. "Ironies in Japanese Defense and Disarmament Policy." In Japanese Foreign Policy Today: A Reader, eds. Takashi Inoguchi and Purnendra Jain. New York: Palgrave.

Tsutsui, Kiyoteru. 2006. "Redressing Past Human Rights Violations: Global Dimensions of Contemporary Social Movements." Social Forces 85 (1): 331-54.

Ueno, Chizuko. 2004. Nationalism and Gender. Trans. Beverley Yamamoto. Melbourne: Trans Pacific.

Uesugi, Satoshi. 2005. "Futatabi 'uraguchi nyugaku' shita 'Tsukuru kai' rekishi kyokasho: Yomigaeru kokoku shikan no kiken na honshitu" ["Tsukuru Kai" History Textbooks Entering Through the Back Door Again: The Dangerous Nature of Reviving Imperial Views of History]. In Tsukkatara kiken "Tsukuru kai" rekishi • komin kyokasho: Kodomowo senso ni michibiku kyokasho ha iranai, [The Danger of Using "Tsukuru Kai" Civics and History Textbooks: We Don't Need Textbooks Guiding Children Toward War], eds. Uesugi Satoshi, Omori Akiko, Takashima Nobuyoshi, and Nishino Rumiko. Tokyo: Akashi Shoten.

Yamamoto, Mitsuru. 1987. "<Gaiatsu-hanno> no juncan wo koete" [Beyond the Cycle of <External Pressure and Reaction>]. In Kokusai kanko no henyo to nichibei kankei [Transformation of International Environment and Japan-US Relations], eds. Hosoya Chihiro and Aruga Tadashi. Tokyo: Tokyo Daigaku Shuppankai.

Yamashita, Yeong-Ae. 2009. "Nihonjin 'ianfu' wo meguru kioku to gensetsu: Chinmoku ga imisuru mono" [Memories of and Discourses on Japanese "Comfort Women": Implications of Silence]. In Boryoku to senso: Jenda-shi sosho 5 [Violence and War: Gender History Series Volume 5], eds. Kato Chikako and Hosoya Minoru. Tokyo: Akashi Shoten.

Yasutomo, Dennis. 1995. The New Multilateralism in Japan's Foreign Policy. New York: St. Martin's Press.

Yeung, C. K. 2001. "Japan's Role in the Making of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC)." In Japanese Foreign Policy in Asia and the Pacific: Domestic Interests, American Pressure, and Regional Integration, eds. Akitoshi Miyashita and Yoichiro Sato. New York: Palgrave.

Yudal-Davis, Nira. 1997. Gender & Nation. London: Sage.

Yuval-Davis, Nira, and Floya Anthias. 1989 "Introduction." In Woman-Nation-State, eds. Nira Yuval-Davis and Floya Anthias. London: Macmillan.

Yoshida, Takashi et al. 1997. Shinpen: Atarashii shakai: Rekishi [New Edition: New Social Studies: History]. Tokyo: Tokyo Shoseki.

Wæver, Ole. 1996a. "The Rise and Fall of the Inter-Paradigm Debate." In International Theory: Positivism & Beyond, eds. Steve Smith, Ken Booth, and Marysia Zalewski. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 1996b. "European Security Identities." Journal of Common Market Studies 34 (1): 103-32.

Walt, Stephen M. 1991. "The Renaissance of Security Studies." International Studies Quarterly 35 (2): 211-39.

———. 1998. "International Relations: One World, Many Theories." Foreign Policy 110 (Spring): 29-32+34-46.

Waltz, Kenneth N. 1993. "The Emerging Structure of International Politics." International Security 18 (2): 44-79.

Wan, Min. 1995. "Spending Strategies in World Politics: How Japan Has Used Its Economic Power in the Past Decade." International Studies Quarterly 39 (1): 85-108.

Weber, Cynthia. 1998. "Performative States." Millennium: Journal of International Studies 27 (1): 77-95.

———. 2006. Imagining America at War: Morality, Politics, and Film. London: Routledge.

———. 2009. International Relations Theory: A Critical Introduction. 3rd ed. London: Routledge.

Weldes, Jutta, Mark Laffey, Hugh Gusterson, and Raymond Duvall. 1999. "Introduction: Constructing Insecurity." In Cultures of Insecurity: States, Communities, and the Production of Danger, eds. Jutta Weldes, Mark Laffey, Hugh Gusterson, and Raymond Duvall. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Wendt, Alexander. 1992. "Anarchy Is What States Make of It: The Social Construction of Power Politics." International Organization 46 (2): 391-425.

———. 1999. Social Theory of International Politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

———. 2000. "On the Via Media: A Response to the Critics." Review of International Studies 26 (1): 165-80.

Zehfusss, Maja. 2001. "Constructivism and Identity: A Dangerous Liaison." European Journal of International Relations 7 (3): 315-48.

VITA

YOSHIKO YAMADA

Born, Tokyo, Japan

- 2005 B.A., Sociology
 Soka University
 Tokyo, Japan
- 2006 M.A., International Relations
 Lancaster University
 Lancaster, United Kingdom
- 2008-2013 Doctoral Candidate
 Florida International University
 Miami, Florida
- Teaching Assistant
 Florida International University
 Miami, Florida

PRESENTATIONS

Yamada, Yoshiko. 2010. "Okinawan Identity in the Media Discourse: Analysis of Editorials on a Rape Case in Okinawa." Presented at the Annual Meeting of the International Studies Association-South Region, St. Petersburg.

———. 2011. "Feminizing Japanese Identity: A Discursive Analysis of a Rape Case in Okinawa." Presented at the Annual Meeting of the International Studies Association, Montreal.

———. 2012. "The Comfort Women Issue: Facing the Legacy of Sovereign Violence and the Discursive Construction of 'Postwar Japan.'" Presented at the Virginia Tech ASPECT Conference, Blacksburg.

———. 2012. "Narrating the Comfort Women Issue: The Discursive Construction of Japan and the Haunting Other." Presented at the Annual Meeting of the International Studies Association, San Diego.