The Background

In 1787, 11 vessels sailed from Portsmouth, England for Australia to establish a colony. Of the nearly 1,500 people on board, half were convicted criminals (564 men and 192 women.) The remainder included sailors and Royal marines to guard the convicts. The government authorities planning the venture knew little about the destination. Their only knowledge was from a short visit (paid 17 years before) by Captain Cook, the famed English explorer.

The journey was completed without loss of ship and with only 48 deaths (a very low figure, considering the miserable conditions). Cook's glowing reports about the place proved far from accurate. Colonists were forced to live on the limited and poor quality supplies brought from England. They faced continual hunger, miserable dwellings, a hostile environment and complete isolation from home.

On June 4, 1789, to enrich this bleak life, convict actors presented a play, the Restoration comedy The Recruiting Officer, under the direction of young Marine Lieutenant Ralph Clark. This surprising event served as the basis for Thomas Keneally's novel The Playmaker, which in turn inspired the author of Our Country's Good. Today we find parallels between this living history of 18th Century convicts and many of today's concerns, such as crime and criminals, the redemption of human beings, and hope.
