Obama said his administration was in denial. He began by saying that the issue of immigration without the Golden Panthers.

Fidel Urbina, a junior business administration major and vice about immigration reform, adding that, as a nation, because of poor immigration resources on worrying about its executive order. In the meantime, Obama promised to continue pursuing all legal avenues to ensure that changes are made. In addition to expanding the benefits of DACA and the program for undocumented parents, Obama said his administration would work to change how the Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and the U.S. border patrol system operates, as the administration doesn’t want to allocate resources in a wasteful way. Obama said that he aims to have these border patrol agencies focus not on targeting undocumented families but criminals who may pose a threat to national security. Diaz-Balart interjected by saying that sometimes these orders are not always followed by border patrol agencies. President Obama responded by saying that every time that a large bureaucracy changes its policies there will be several instances in which people will not follow orders. He added that the Secretary of Homeland Security Jeh Johnson is on board with his plan.

\section*{Domestic violence discussion hosted by Greek organizations}

\textbf{ADRIAN SUAREZ AVILA}

News Director
adrian.suarezavila@fiusm.com

When one of the sisters of Alpha Chi Omega sorority, who wishes to remain anonymous, was in an abusive relationship, she was in denial. In an effort to call attention to domestic abuse, the brothers of Theta Chi fraternity and sisters of Alpha Chi Omega met on Feb. 23 to host a domestic abuse forum titled, “Sacred Purpose: Breaking the Silence,” at the Modesto A. Maidique Campus.

Fidel Urbina, a junior business administration major and vice president of health and safety for Theta Chi’s Beta Omega chapter at the University, was in charge of coordinating the event. His intention was to target the University community in order to spread awareness of the issue, an issue he believes is oftentimes ignored. “I believe that the topics that are done through the Greek community, like cancer and Alzheimer’s are also really important, but I feel like domestic violence is something that people don’t really cover, and it’s something that people basically silence,” he said.

In the process of coordinating the event, Urbina spoke to Alpha Chi Omega sorority, whose philanthropic efforts are targeted at domestic abuse. He also spoke to the University’s Victim Empowerment Program and The Lodge Miami.

The Lodge Miami, which was opened on May 14, 2004, by Victim Response, Inc., serves as a shelter for those individuals who have been victims of domestic violence, sexual assault or rape in Miami-Dade County, according to the Victim Response web page.

Operated privately and funded publicly, The Lodge Miami represents the future of what may be accomplished as a result of both the public and private sectors coming together to work simultaneously on addressing issues that affect the community. A gender-neutral center where all services are free and confidential, The Lodge Miami helps abused individuals get referrals to different agencies, identify transitional housing and identify therapy centers, among other things.

The Lodge assists with the whole process of helping abused individuals get back on their feet without leaving them to depend on someone who is making them go through a violent situation, according to Elvia Vazquez, victim advocate at The Lodge Miami who presented at the event.

Vazquez believes that spreading awareness of this issue in college environments is particularly important. “This is the time that people are becoming independent and they are becoming their own, they’re trying to discover themselves, they’re trying to inform themselves, they can use information and to the people that they are going to be working with when they get out to the real world,” she said.

With Islamic State threatening, Turkey abandons historic tomb in Syria

After months of siege by Islamic State extremists, Turkey early Sunday sent an armored column into Syria to evacuate troops that had been guarding the tomb of Suleyman Shah, the grandfather of the founder of the Ottoman Empire.

The government announced that nearly 600 soldiers were deployed to the site on the Euphrates river late Saturday. The troops removed Suleyman Shah’s sarcophagus, and then destroyed the mausoleum. Turkey said it would house Suleyman Shah’s remains in the Ashura region, close to the Turkish border, after a new mausoleum is built.

The operation ended what in effect was a long-running hostage crisis, which began when Islamic State forces captured the area surrounding the enclave about a year ago.

Army to send headquarters group to Kandahar in first sign of revision to Afghan withdrawal plan

In the first official sign that the Pentagon plans to keep a U.S. military presence in southern Afghanistan after this year, the Army is sending the 7th Infantry Division headquarters from Joint Base Lewis-McChord on a year-long deployment to Kandahar Province this spring.

The deployment follows Defense Secretary Ashton Carter’s weekend visit to Kandahar, where he acknowledged in a meeting with soldiers that the Obama administration was reconsidering the pace of its planned withdrawal of the 10,000 U.S. troops who remain in Afghanistan. The deployment is small, fewer than 100 soldiers.

The division’s deployment has been an open secret at the base for months. The Pentagon in December announced that it was adding staff to the headquarters to help it reach a deployable strength.

Clinton to women: It can still feel like 1955 out there

Hillary Clinton, the first female candidate to seriously vie for the presidency, told thousands of Silicon Valley professionals Tuesday that despite strides in the United States for women, the economy in many ways is still operating like it’s 1955.

“Not just a problem for women,” Clinton told the audience of 5,000, most of them women. “It’s a problem for everyone.”

Clinton peppered her 35-minute speech here with personal anecdotes as she pushed women to work together to elevate more females to leadership positions, secure benefits in their workplace and change society to be more welcoming to families.

informing the community on these issues is very important.

“I feel that, not only with my sorority, but events like this, it promotes the awareness of other [forms of domestic violence] that go around campus,” she said.

She credited the event for informing those in attendance about the flags of domestic abuse, indicators that reveal that a person is involved in an abusive relationship. She admitted that during the time of her relationship she wasn’t even aware of the flags she was exhibiting to her friends and family members.

When she noticed the changes in her life during the relationship, particularly the negative mindset that she was developing, she decided to get help.

She believes that support from friends and family members is just one of many resources that one may resort to.

“When dealing with people of different cultures, Vazquez admits that drawing attention to cultural factors is critical. She mentioned that although a lot of people think it’s okay to be treated aggressively because the behavior is normal in their respective culture, it’s not okay when it involves violence.

Among the many topics that Vazquez covered were the definition of domestic violence and what it entails, what an abuser does, the dynamics of textual harassment, teen dating violence, and what a healthy relationship is.

One of the statistics that Vazquez shared was that 73 percent of domestic violence victims are female and that the same percentage of domestic violence cases go unreported.

Vazquez commented that some of the women who visit The Lodge Miami arrive in yoga clothes in order to disguise their intention to seek help from abusive partners.

She added that individuals in abusive relationships are in situations that are not easy to escape.

According to her, people oftentimes don’t understand that when a person tries to leave an abusive relationship the lethality of the situation increases, as the abusive partner may become more violent.

The anonymous sister feels that knowledge of one’s own feelings is just as important as knowledge of the dynamics of abuse.

“I think it’s really [about learning] about yourself. What do you feel, and how you should feel, to know or be aware that you are in the domestic violence relationship,” she said.

Masters program celebrates 20 years

“They come from doing wonderful things and here they are able to develop their creativity and their person- ality, to reflect all they have done. Some simply come for a first experience in the field,” Vignon said.

Like Vignon, who is from Spain, many of the program’s professors also come from different Spanish-speaking countries, making the program exceptionally diversified.

Claudia Gonzalez-Soto, a Colombian student in the program, has been interested in studying journalism for years. However, at the time of her undergraduate years in Barranquilla, Colombia, there were no well-known journalism programs.

She came to FIU with two masters degrees in Mental Health Counseling and Clinical Psychology. Now, she wants to put her expertise in the field of journalism.

“Even though I studied psychology, I want to use it in mass communications. What motivated me the most is that everything is taught in Spanish,” Gonzalez-Soto said.

“I think that journalism is a lovely career where we can do a lot of good to society,” Gonzalez-Soto said, “because we have to inform people about the reality of what is happening. That’s why I think this career is very important.”

According to Diament, the future of journalism is uncertain with changes in technology, for example.

However, the program is willing to prepare the students for that.

“Our challenge is to prepare professionals who are going to work in that future and train them and give them the ability to adapt to this unknown future – no matter what the changes in the media landscape may be,” Diament said.

Meet and greets don’t deliver the whole package

JESSICA SOLER
Contributing Writer

It is pretty standard that musical artists offer meet and greet or VIP packages during their tours. It gives fans the opportunity to meet the musician, or all the members of a band, for a short while and is a great experience. However, it comes at a high price, literally. Depending on the popularity of the artist, packages can range anywhere from $50 to thousands of dollars and often those packages do not include a general admission ticket. While there are benefits to purchasing the packages, they do not outweigh the shortcomings. Meet and greets are fun. The anticipation is exhilarating, the encounter is surreal and it can make the performance more enjoyable. They also give the buyer the advantage of early admission into the venue, which is crucial. However, the expense for these packages can break the bank and for that amount of money spent, the experience can feel impersonal and rushed. A lot of people purchase these tickets and because the meetings occur right before the show, time is limited. These packages give fans just enough time to have their memorabilia signed and picture taken before being shoved out of the way to make room for the next group to be shuffled through. While the tickets for the VIP packages are limited, there is a solid amount sold. By the time half the group has been admitted the artist seems to have lost their enthusiasm. It is like they revert to autopilot. The whole experience is narrowed down to signing whatever is shoved in front of them and smiling for a picture. Interaction with the fan becomes secondary. As a fan, it feels as though I annoyed the artist with my very presence. I feel the need to apologize once my time is up, as if my appreciation for their music came off as offending. Granted, there will be those understanding bands that genuinely enjoy the time spent with their fans, but they are few. This is not to say that VIP packages should not be an option. There has to be some kind of a system to them or the process would fail. The packages can’t be free or there would be no show. On the opposite side, the prices should not be raised or no one would be able to afford them besides a select few. However, the meet and greets should be revised.

These packages give fans just enough time to have their memorabilia signed and picture taken before being shoved out of the way to make room for the next group to be shuffled through.

For example, instead of standing in line just to have a piece of paper signed, bands could spend that time interacting with the fans. I have experienced this kind of meet and greet once and it was, by far, the best. The group was more relaxed—as relaxed as you can be around celebrities—and it was more informal. Everyone took their own selfies with the band and was able to have an actual conversation with them.

Another option could be to schedule meet and greets at different times throughout the day; devoted fans will show up undoubtedly. Singer Rou Reynolds of the band Enter Shikari wrote, “If someone believes it is morally justifiable to charge you to meet them, you have to ask yourself the question, ‘Do they deserve to be met?’ In fact, do they deserve to meet you?”

Terrorism does not originate from religion

JENNIFER BLANCO
opinion@fiusm.com

President Barack Obama directed the nation and millions around the world this week at the summit on Countering Violent Extremism. It was truly a poignant speech, clearing up misconceptions many have about the Muslim faith. He rejected the notion that terrorism stems from Islamic values, and urged us to do the same.

The Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, a terrorist organization, claims to be motivated by Islam; they commit hateful crimes in the name of Allah. President Obama discretes their claim. He says they are motivated by violence and not by any religious ideals. This fallacy leads many people from different faiths to fear Muslims and discriminate against them.

“If you kill one innocent person, it’s as if you killed mankind,” Obama quoted from the Quran. If it wasn’t obvious before, I think this speech clarified any false pretenses people had about the Muslim faith. Their religion does not endorse violent acts of terrorism.

Terrorism emerges from corrupt political regimes, a declining economy and alienation in society. ISIS creates animosity among religions and gains power when we ignorantly fear the unknown. As President Obama stated, ISIS wants to cause a clash of civilizations by pinning religions against each other. If you kill one innocent person, it’s as if you killed mankind. Barack Obama United States President Quoting the Quran

It isn’t about religion, it’s about power. Obama claims that building schools and promoting economic growth for families abroad will encourage anti-terrorism by keeping children out of trouble and away from the hands of ISIS. Terrorism is much more complex than the economy and education. Political corruption and oppression has led individuals to radicalize for centuries. Despite economic status or religion, political instability has forced rebels to emerge. For instance, Obama noted that Osama Bin Laden came from a wealthy background, and still became one of the biggest names in terrorist history. Economic growth itself will not eradicate terrorism. Only democracy can do that.

Obama admitted there is something everyone could do to help stop terrorism, including ordinary people. By not taking part in racial profiling and eliminating anti-muslim sentiment, our focus can be on preventing terrorists organizations from emerging.

Alienating muslims or acting against them will only empower groups like ISIS and goes against what our country believes in. We are a country based on freedom of religion. Thus, rather than judging religions or races, we should judge their motives.

Many presidents have given speeches about countering violent acts of terrorism. In my opinion, none have tackled it as effectively as President Obama. In order to prevent a future “clash of civilizations,” we can’t be bystanders. There is something each and every one of us can do to help tackle the fight on global terrorism, one kind gesture at a time.

“Rumors” spreads to University

NADINE RODRIGUEZ

Premiering at the Wertheim Performing Arts Center’s Mainstage Theatre Feb. 27 and running through March 8 is Neil Simon’s “Rumors,” a twisted farce both in its comedy and its plot.

To provide a glimpse into the play, two lead actors, Danny Leonard and Natalie Brenes, both senior theater performance majors, shared their thoughts.

“The play is really fun, really funny and very active. It’s a great production,” Brenes said. “I think the audience will really, really enjoy it. It’s for the masses, and very active. It’s a great production,”

According to Brenes there are 12 characters in the play, but the audience becomes the 13th.

“Their reaction, when they laugh, will help the play move along. We want the audience to enjoy the show, so its going to be a new show every night since we have new audience members,” Leonard said.

Director Matthew Glass also spoke about his upcoming production.

“Directing a farce is very difficult: its all about the timing.” Glass said. “You have to be exact and there’s a structure that is rigid and can’t bend, yet gives the actors enough room to play. It’s all about the door slamming at the right time to cue the next bit that’s going to happen.”

Despite the difficulties, Glass assures that the play is funny. “Neil Simon has a bad rep, but turns on CNN and take a look around at what’s happening in the world. I think audiences will welcome two hours of just laughter. They don’t have to do anything but enjoy and laugh … I want the audience to dance out of the theater, happy,” Glass said.

Tickets for “Rumors” are $10 for students, $12 for seniors and staff and $15 for general admission.

“We need the audience,” Glass said. “We want an audience and we’re ready. It’s something I don’t often say when directing a play.”

Student success in swimwear line KOKOAKINIS

Isabella Soto is a digital media studies major at Florida International University, who has always been into owning a small business. At the age of 19, after various occasions of trying to start one, she saw the opportunity to launch her own swimwear line, and she didn’t think twice before doing so. “A couple years ago, I used to buy old jeans at thrift stores and I’d cut them into shorts and sell them on Envy [A small business website],” Soto said. “Then I started my own fashion blog, but it’s expensive to maintain so I didn’t do it as often.”

It wasn’t until Soto launched KOKOAKINIS in December 2014, that she grasped on to the success of a fast-growing company. “When you start off your business, you never think it’s going to do so well. I get e-mails from people in Hawaii or Sweden with questions about my swimwear. It’s kind of surreal,” Soto said.

She says a major part of her growth since it was launched, less than three months ago, has to do with her marketing and photography choices. Soto created the concept behind KOKOAKINIS, as a line that any girl of any size and body type could identify with and want to wear. The models she uses for her swimwear are girls of all shapes and body types.

She emphasized the fact that her customers should identify with the organic beauty of her models. Soto accomplishes this by doing minimal editing to her images and focusing on the bikinis’ style complementing the model’s body.

“The first collection was all over the place. I didn’t have a theme. I was just picking what I really liked and thought would look good,” Soto said.

Soto began her business with the help and lead of her mother, Paula Lopez, who she describes as her backbone in the process. Lopez came up with the name “KOKOAKINIS,” from what Soto said sounded “catchy” and they decided to keep it.

Her mother, a Colombian native who has been living in the United States for 15 years, studied fashion at the Miami International University of Art & Design. At a young age, Soto would watch her mother work on fashion pieces for school projects. She recalls going to one of her mother’s fashion shows when Lopez was still enrolled in the fashion school.

“My mother is living vicariously through me with KOKOAKINIS,” Soto said. “She has always wanted to own a business of her own.”

After graduating, Lopez began designing a sportswear line. She hired a seamstress in Barranquilla, Colombia to make the clothes for the business. The sportswear line was discontinued after a short time.

Soto, being curious about Isabella Soto, a digital media studies major, draws on her notepad the latest designs of her swimwear line.

“It’s been a learning process along the way,” Soto said. “But when I wake up every morning the only thing I want to focus on is my swimwear line.”

The second collection, “Spring 115,” will launch in early March of this year. It will include three different sections divided by color themes; one with only black pieces, another with earthy, more subtle tones and the third will have versatile brighter tones keeping KOKOAKINIS true to Miami’s liveliness and beaches.

I t a p p e a r s E D M has held onto the Miami spotlight l o n g e n o u g h. We have become all too familiar with EDM, and now it’s time for hip-hop to seize the moment and dazzle everyone with its brilliance in the Rolling Loud festival.

Ultra was only the gateway for music enthusiasts that crave for a grander, over the top music celebration.

To understand the level of greatness the Rolling Loud Festival aspires to be, think of it as Ultra’s hip-hop fraternal twin, especially with the announcement of a performance lineup that will rival all the big names performing in this year’s festival.

Chief Oyabun views the festival as a competition for fans. “As an artist fighting for the same thing, we are all competing for the crowd even though we’re all friends,” Oyabun said.

In my interview with Johnny Billonz, he said that he feels that he doesn’t have the same notoriety as Schoolboy Q and that he has to be working harder than him, which will be hard to do but he plans to really stand out which will be hard to do but he plans to really stand out and make people remember him.

Each artist has high expectations for Rolling Loud and aims to outperform the other, which brings even more excitement for this hip-hop extravaganza.

Don’t miss out on Chief Oyabun who has prepared a peculiar surprise for the audience. He is expecting to deliver a must-see performance that will catch everyone off guard.

Too Bold to Gamble is a column by Joshua Kawainqui Kasanova Nichols, a finance and information technology major. He follows local performances around South Florida and is a DJ at WRGP known as Y2K. After the report last week by The Miami Herald that FIU added Booker T. Washington High School’s head football coach Tim Harris Jr. as the new running backs coach, the university officially announced the hire on Tuesday, Feb. 24.

While a lot of buzz has been surrounding this coaching acquisition since the story came out last week, nothing was official until FIU’s announcement.

Panthers ready to take on Manhattan for home series

alejandro.aguirre@fiusm.com

After coming from a 2-3 road trip this past weekend, the Panthers will come back home and battle it out against non-conference opponent Manhattan College. FIU will play against them this weekend in a four game series starting on Friday night.

Going into this game the Panthers have an even record of 4-4 and look to capitalize on a struggling Manhattan team. Even though these games are non-conference games, it still gives FIU a chance to get their record over the .500 mark and have a winning record when they actually enter conference play.

This season for Manhattan has not started the way they expected as they have dropped their first four games in a row. In those four games they have been outscored by 30 runs.

In total they have given up 39 runs and have answered those runs by only scoring nine runs of their own.

This shows that the pitching staff for the Jaspers has been struggling as of late and have not been able to keep the games low scoring which is obviously why Manhattan has a 0-4 start. With the pitchers giving up many runs it puts more pressure on the hitters to score more runs and that is a recipe for disaster that no baseball team wants to experience.

This series is set up to be in FIU’s favor to take the series since they have been playing good baseball as of late and are entering this series versus the Jaspers on a two game win streak.

Expect the Panthers to be headlined by their pitching staff to silence Manhattan’s struggling bats. The pitching rotation is going to be heavily depended on since they will be playing four games in three days which includes a doubleheader on Saturday so its all hands on deck for the Panthers. Games like this against struggling teams like Manhattan need to be automatic wins for FIU and they need to take advantage of the opportunities they get to win ball games now and for the rest of the season.

For the second time in five years, multiple stars have chosen South Beach as their place to come together at once and cause a big splash. And after five long years of waiting to see if the two greatest professional boxers of the age would agree to into the ring with one another, it all took was both happening to be at the same basketball game on a Tuesday night to get Manny Pacquiao and Floyd Mayweather to get things moving in the right direction. Back on Tuesday, Jan. 27 of this year, the Miami Heat were facing the Milwaukee Bucks in a regular season matchup while both teams were, and still are, fighting for a playoff spot.

The interest was focused on opposite sides of the court, but not those of the visiting and home teams. The real attention was on the courtside locations of World Boxing Champions Floyd Mayweather Jr. and Manny Pacquiao. Congressmen and eight division world fighting champ Pacquiao was in Miami to judge the Miss Universe Pageant which was held at the US Century Bank Arena at Florida International University, along with 19-time Grammy Award Winning musician and producer Emilio Estefan, NFL pro-bowler Desean Jackson, Creative Director of Marie Claire Magazine Nina Garcia, Entrepreneur Rob Dyrdek, Real Housewives of Beverly Hills star Lisa Vanderpump, TV heartthrob William Levy, Former Laguna Beach star Kristin Cavallari, Fashion Journalist Louise Roe, and Miami Marlins $325 million man Giancarlo Stanton. The Pageant was held Sunday, Jan. 25, and a couple of nights later, Pacquiao found himself across the court from Mayweather, who also happened to be at American Airlines Arena to take in the game, coincidentally.

During the game, once the arena became aware that the two men who have been seemingly playing a game of cat-and-mouse with each other for almost half a decade, both were picture on the jumbotron above half-court, with the words “Coming in 2015?” above the live-feed of them in their seats taking in the game. By halftime of the contest, the fighters, much like the rest of the sporting world, grew too tired and restless to wait for at least an inch of ground to be made in this potential match of the century, and they made their way to half court to speak face to face. The conversation didn’t seem confrontational, as the two exchanged numbers and met up in Pacquiao’s hotel room later that night to talk business. The boxers have spent a large amount of time going back and forth to get the fight to happen, arguing and disagreeing on who should get the majority of the revenue and other specifics of the sort. The entire world has grown tired of waiting on the two to put their egos aside.

A case can be made that the fight is long overdue, and might not even be worth the hype, as both men are said to be long past their primes. Regardless of any of this, fact or not, everyone is excited. After a few more weeks of fans waiting and boxers talking, it became official on Friday, Feb. 20, that the two would face off at the MGM Grand in Las Vegas on Saturday, May 2. If you don’t have a $250,000 credit line with the MGM Grand for ringside seats, the Pay-Per-View is being rumored to cost around $100 dollars, as this is estimated to be the biggest boxing event in the sports history. It will likely shatter any existing revenue records.

We are not the University of Miami. We are not the University of Florida or Florida State University. We are Florida International University. However, you wouldn’t know that if you just took a look at our student body. Walking around the Modesto A. Maidique campus a clear majority of the gear worn, besides greek letters, is from different universities. There is no spirit, or general good feeling, for the university that most of these students will graduate from.

I have personally heard the arguments that UM was the “dream school” or that “I’ll get there eventually” from different people. Yes, I get that it was your dream of being a student at UM, at least for whatever portion of your schooling you are in now while taking classes at the University. My only two reasons I would accept for those statements are if you got your bachelor’s or other such degree there and are here at the University for a graduate program or if your parents/parent or significant other goes or went there. Those are the only reasons I personally accept.

If you want to leave the University to go to some other university go ahead and do it. Quit making excuses because if it truly is your “dream” you will do anything to achieve it.

You are not a Hurricane or a Gator or an Auburn, you are FIU. The objective of these meetings is to give interested individuals an opportunity to hear arguments pertaining to the proposed increase to the Activity and Service fee. The amended fee will become effective in the Fall 2015 term. Students and other interested individuals are invited to attend these meetings.

We also have a slew of other sports gaining momentum to be great at the University. However, how would you feel if you were at your job, working your hardest, and someone came up to you showing support for another company that does your same job but at a higher level? It would suck. That is exactly how some athletes at the University feel about seeing students wearing gear from other universities at their games, meets and tournaments.

I, who participated in tailgates for football games, not only saw hundreds of students not even go into the game, but also saw persons, that I personally know to be students at the University, wearing gear from both UM and FSU on multiple occasions.

Why is this ok? Oh wait. It’s not.

To encounter the Biscayne Bay Campus in a different light, the BBC Recreation Center will host Kayak Day on the Bay, a sport kayaking excursion through Biscayne Bay and the Mangrove Trails of Oleta State Park.

"If you’re thinking of kayaking, you wouldn’t think: Saturday, daytime afternoon, the sun is shining, the waters nice, go out on the bay, but the community also,” said Torrey.

According to the BBC REC Center website, there will be expert staff present throughout the trip to lead and to demonstrate the basics of kayaking. The event is offered once a month with two separate trips. The first at 10:00 a.m. and the second at 12:00 p.m., each an hour and thirty minutes long.

Torrey said that the trips can last for almost two hours, depending on the skill set of the group. “We don’t leave anyone behind and no one jumps ahead,” Torrey said. “We move together as one unit for safety.”

In a previous FIU Student Media interview, Torrey said that the center started out with a single kayak that was used for summer camps. Over time, the number of kayaks grew to allow more students and the community to participate in activities on the water.

“Was what kind of our initiative in the beginning of the whole program was to find a way where, not only student can enjoy going out on the bay, but the community also,” Torrey said.

In addition to Kayak on the Bay, the center’s Adventure X program hosts Kayak After Dark, as well as Panther Paddle, Night Paddle and private excursions on the bay.

Kayak After Dark is held at 7:00 p.m. once a month, “an evening of excursion kayaking under the Biscayne Bay stars,” states the center’s website.

Torrey said more people participate in the daytime kayaking event because they feel more comfortable. “[During] daytime, because it doesn’t have the nighttime element, we get more people. The scenery is different,” said Torrey.

“People feel like they have to do the daytime one first in order to feel comfortable for the nighttime kayaking.”

Kayak After Dark also comes with nervousness because people hear splashes in the water, said Torrey. Unlike Kayak on the Bay, its nighttime version has only one trip. It is recommended that students try kayaking during the day first.

“I like being by the bay and I think it makes the campus more interesting,” said Uriel Cordoba, a sophomore biology major. “I’ve never done it, and I’m sure none of my friends have done it. So I think it would be a great time,” he said.

To sign up, participants must reserve online at active.com. For each trip, students pay a fee of $5.00 while non-FIU students pay $10.00.

Torrey said he definitely encourages students that have never gone before to come out and get the experience.

“Come out and enjoy it. If it’s your first time, come get the feel of it so that if you decide to come back again, you will be very familiar,” Torrey said. “It’s not a dead summer trip -- just come out and enjoy it.”
